

Ott
612
.3.15

HARVARD COLLEGE LIBRARY

Cabinet Edition.

---

THE

INVASION OF THE CRIMEA.

VOL. IX.

o

THE
INVASION OF THE CRIMEA:

ITS ORIGIN, AND AN ACCOUNT OF ITS PROGRESS DOWN TO THE DEATH OF LORD RAGLAN.

BY A. W. KINGLAKE.

NEW EDITION.

VOL. IX.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD AND SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

MCMII.

O H G 12.1.3.15

HARVARD COLLEGE LIBRARY FROM THE LIBRARY OF
HENRY S. HOUSMAN
MARCH 11, 1940

CONTENTS.

---

CHAPTER I.

THE NEW FRENCH COMMANDER AND THE PROSPECTS OF VIGOROUS ACTION
IN THE FIELD OF EGYPT.—THE POSITION OF THE ALLIES.—THE POSITION OF THE BRITISH.—THE PROBLEM AWAITING SOLUTION.—THE RESOLVES OF PÉLISSIER.—THE IMPENDING STRIFE BETWEEN HIM AND THE EMPEROR.

I.

	PAGE
Pélissier, . . . . .	1

II

Accord between Pélissier and Lord Raglan, . . . . .	4
Full discretion demanded, . . . . .	5
Prospect of the two generals being able to act in full concert, . .	5
Concord also to be expected with the Sardinian contingent, . .	6
And with Omar Pasha, . . . . .	7

III.

Strength of the Allies, . . . . .	7
Of the Russians, . . . . .	8

IV.

The problem to be solved by the Allies, . . . . .	9
---------------------------------------------------	---

V.

Pélissier's resolves, . . . . .	10
Prospect of violent strife between Louis Napoleon and Pélissier,	13

CHAPTER II.*NEW COUNTER-APPROACHES AND CONSEQUENT FIGHTS ON THE WESTERN FLANK OF SEVASTOPOL.

The Cimetière Ridge,	16
Measures for securing it taken by the French and the Russians,	17
 II.
Todleben's project,	17
And Khrouleff's,	17
Both the projects adopted,	18
And executed in the night of the 21st, resulting in,	18
The Cimetière, counter-approach,	18
And the Bay-head entrenchment,	18
 III.
Pelissier,	18
His resolve to attack the counter-approaches on the night of the 22d,	18
Preparation on both sides for the night encounter,	19
 IV.
Strength of the troops about to be engaged,	19
Attack and capture of the Bay-head counter-approach,	20
 V.
The Cimetière counter-approach,	20
Auxiliary cannonade of the Central Bastion,	20
Attack and first capture of the Cimetière counter-approach,	21
Its recapture,	21
Third capture of the Cimetière counter-approach,	21
Fourth capture of the Work,	21
Fifth attack on the Work,	22
And its recapture by the French,	23
 VI.
Course afterwards taken by the French,	26
 VII.
Signals from the Volokoff tower,	28

CHAPTER II.—continued.

Their effect on Prince Gortchakoff's determination,	24
His decision,	25
Night of the 23d; the Cimetières counter-approach carried by the French,	25
And transformed into a siege-work,	25
Losses on each side,	25

VIII

Ground on which the sacrifices made by Péliusser were justified,	26
------------------------------------------------------------------	----

CHAPTER III.

PÉLISSIER FIRMLY PURSUING HIS CHOSEN PLANS OF ATTACK IN THESE VARIOUS STAGES

Impending strife between Louis Napoleon and Péliusser,	27
The Emperor,	27
Péliusser,	27
Marshal Vaillant,	27
Péliusser's determination to renew the attack upon Kertch,	28
General Niel at the Conference,	28
His written protest,	28
21st May. Péliusser to Minister of War,	29
22d May. Same to same,	29
Louis Napoleon to Péliusser,	30
Louis Napoleon again to Péliusser,	31
Péliusser to the Minister of War,	32
Louis Napoleon to Péliusser,	32
Péliusser to the Minister of War,	32
Position and lamentations of General Niel	33
Niel's entire loss of power,	34
Antagonism between Louis Napoleon and Péliusser,	35
Péliusser's five resolves,	35
Louis Napoleon opposed to each of them,	35
Péliusser's resistance,	36
His method,	36
Occupation by the Allies of fresh ground towards the Tchernaya,	36
Péliusser having his way,	37
Allusion to the Directory of 1794-97 and the great Bonaparte,	38

CHAPTER IV.

THE RENEWED EXPEDITION TO KERTCH, WITH ITS SEQUEL IN THE SEA OF AZOF, AND ON THE CIRCASSIAN COAST.

L

Relevance of some previous statements to the subject of this second Expedition, . . . . .	39
Composition of the armada, . . . . .	40
Its course, . . . . .	41
The strength of Baron Wrangel, . . . . .	41
The predicament in which he was placed . . . . .	41
His resolve, . . . . .	41
The power to which he succumbed, . . . . .	41
Baron Wrangel's retreat, . . . . .	43
Unopposed landing of the troops, . . . . .	43
Sir George Brown's measures on shore, . . . . .	44
Baron Wrangel's destruction of his Coast batteries, . . . . .	44
Retreat of Russian troops, . . . . .	44
Destruction of food by Baron Wrangel, . . . . .	45
The squadron of Kertch, . . . . .	46
M'Killop's exploits, . . . . .	46
The fate of the squadron, . . . . .	47
The allied navies, . . . . .	47
Their operations, . . . . .	47
Channel into the Azof found and buoyed, . . . . .	47
Miranda reaching the entrance of the Sea of Azof, . . . . .	48
Advance of the land forces through Kertch, . . . . .	48
To Yeni Kalé, . . . . .	48
The General and the Admirals meeting, . . . . .	48
Disorders that followed the invasion, . . . . .	48
The limited authority of Sir George Brown, . . . . .	49
Kertch, . . . . .	50
Its prayer to Sir George, . . . . .	50
His rejection of their entreaties, . . . . .	50
Disorders on the march, . . . . .	51
And in Yeni Kalé, . . . . .	51
Cessation of all misconduct of the English troops, . . . . .	51
Measures taken by Sir George for the maintenance of discipline, . . . . .	51
Their result, . . . . .	51
The Tartars in Kertch destroying and plundering, . . . . .	52

CHAPTER IV.—continued.

The measures taken by Brown and by the people of Kertch,	52
Failure of the measures taken,	54
Continued disorders in Kertch,	54
The committers of outrage,	55
Further continuance of the disorders in Kertch,	56
Lord Raglan's indignation,	56
His approval on 31st May of Brown's measures,	56
His completed criticism averted,	56
Sir George not blamable for omitting to repress the disorders of the French,	56
Because virtually unable to do so,	57
Comment on Sir George's course of action with respect to the disorders in Kertch,	57
Friendly disposition of some of the Tartars,	57
Sufferings entailed on the sick and wounded Russians by the pillaging of the hospitals,	59
Letter on their behalf from Baron Wrangel,	59
First results of the Kertch expedition,	60
The main object gained,	61

II.

The Allied Admirals entering the Sea of Azof,	61
Captain Lyons of the Miranda then taking the command of the united flotilla,	62
Nature of the operations undertaken in the Sea of Azof,	62
Fate of the four surviving war-ships of the Kertch squadron,	62
Unchallenged mastery of the Allies in the hitherto 'closed' sea,	63
Access thus obtained to the interior provinces of Russia,	63
As, e.g., to the country of the Don Cossacks,	63
The seat of industry that Lyons disturbed,	64
His task not one leading to battle,	64
His task against vessels found at sea,	65
And those that had fled towards land,	66
26th May. Operation off the Spit of Berdiansk,	66
The wrecks of the four war-steamer that had escaped from Kertch,	65
27th May. Off the town of Berdiansk,	66
28th May. Lyons engaging the port of Arabat,	66
Plan of summoning the authorities,	66
The rejections they elicited,	66

CHAPTER IV.—continued.

These compared with the acts of the authorities professing defiance, . . . . .	67
Operations at Genitchi, 29th May, . . . . .	67
1st to 8th June. Operations at Taganrog and the mouths of the Don, . . . . .	69
The good seamanship manifested by the French and the English, . . . . .	74
5th June. Operations at Mariopol, . . . . .	75
Operations at Chersk, 6th June, . . . . .	75
9th June. Operations on the shore of Kiten Bay, . . . . .	76
Losses of the Russians, . . . . .	76
Of the Allies, . . . . .	76
Causes of their immunity, . . . . .	76
The object of the Allies, . . . . .	77
This in great measure baffled, . . . . .	77
Greatness of the havoc, . . . . .	77
Many of the destroyed vessels Greek, . . . . .	78
The bearing of this circumstance on the Czar's sense of dignity, . . . . .	78
The moral stress put on Russia by taking the Sea of Azof, . . . . .	78
Did the Czar's incapacity to defend his subjects tend at all to shake their old loyalty ? . . . . .	78

III.

Attack on Soudjak-Kalé and Anapa recommended, . . . . .	80
Troops despatched for the purpose, . . . . .	80
Fall of Soudjak-Kalé, . . . . .	81
Desire to attack Anapa, . . . . .	81
This forbidden by Louis Napoleon, . . . . .	81
Pélissier's determined resistance to the prohibition, . . . . .	82
Lord Raglan's censure on the French Emperor, . . . . .	82
Fall of Anapa, . . . . .	83
The enemy's forced abandonment of the whole Circassian coast, . . . . .	83
Troops left to guard the Straits, . . . . .	83
The rest brought back, . . . . .	83

IV.

A contrast, . . . . .	83
General results of the Kertch expedition, . . . . .	84
These not attained by surprise, . . . . .	84
Nor (in the main) by defaults of Russian commanders, . . . . .	85
The phenomenon (so far) left unexplained, . . . . .	86

CHAPTER IV.—continued.

The true explanation,	84
Lyons the originator and eager advocate of the Expedition,	86
Carrying with him Admiral Bruat and Lord Raglan,	86
Pélissier,	86
His propulsion of the measure against the will of his Emperor,	87
Effect of the success on the mind of Louis Napoleon,	88
On the camps of the Allies,	88
On the Russians,	88
The stress it put on their Czar,	89

CHAPTER V.

OPENING OF THE THIRD BOMBARDMENT.—VICTORIOUS ASSAULTS OF ALL THE COUNTER-APPROACHES BY FRENCH AND ENGLISH TROOPS.—CONCLUSION OF THE THIRD BOMBARDMENT.

I.

Resolve of Pélissier and Lord Raglan to attack the counter-approaches in the Karabelnaya,	90
Their concord,	90
The shield this afforded against Louis Napoleon's interference,	91
The vain resistance of Niel,	91
The French Emperor's prohibition,	92
Persistence of Pélissier,	93
The contemplated attack,	94

II.

Resources and preparations of the garrison,	94
Resistance to Todleben,	94
Its consequence,	95

III.

Bombardment of the 6th of June,	96
Pélissier warmly greeted by the English troops,	96
Significance of their cheers,	96
The bombardment continued at night,	97
Bombardment of the 7th of June,	97
Effect of the bombardment,	97

CHAPTER V.—continued.

The fire of the English guns, . . . . .	III
Crippled state of the enemy's works concerned in opposing the French, . . . . .	98
The less injured state of those opposing the English, . . . . .	98
The time for the bayonet come, . . . . .	99

IV.

Plan and preparations for the assault, . . . . .	■
--------------------------------------------------	---

V.

Attack and seizure of the two White Redoubts, . . . . .	100
Seizure and abandonment of the Zabalkansky battery, . . . . .	101
The Russians throwing forward two battalions of their Moroum regiment, . . . . .	101
Movement by Colonel d'Orion under Bosquet's orders, . . . . .	102
His overthrow of the two Moroum battalions, . . . . .	102
400 Russians surrendering, . . . . .	102
French soldiery far out in front, . . . . .	103
Fruitless advances of Russian troops, . . . . .	103
Their reported achievements, . . . . .	103

VI.

The Kamtchatka Lunette to be attacked by the French, . . . . .	106
5.30 P.M. The French troops harangued by Bosquet, . . . . .	106
Their advance in a state of warlike effervescence, . . . . .	107
The Vivandière, . . . . .	107
The Lunette attacked by the French, . . . . .	109
Their first capture of the Work, . . . . .	109
Their impetuous advance on the Malakoff, . . . . .	110
Their retreat when attacked in strength by General Khrouleff, . . . . .	110
Khrouleff's recapture of the Kamtchatka Lunette, . . . . .	111
General Bosquet's measures, . . . . .	112
Second and definitive capture of the Lunette by the French, . . . . .	112
The Malakoff judged by Todleben to be in imminent danger, . . . . .	112

VII.

'The Quarries,' . . . . .	118
The enemy's measures of defence, . . . . .	114

CHAPTER V.—continued.

The great and exclusive advantage about to be enjoyed by the enemy,	115
Lord Raglan's dispositions for the attack,	■■■
Advance of our storming-parties,	116
Their seizure of the Work,	116
Capture of the collateral entrenchments,	117
Flight of the defenders, pursued by our troops,	118
Our men in the extreme front,	118
The tasks yet awaiting our people,	118
Major Armstrong,	118
Colonel Campbell's command,	119
Colonel Grant's meeting with Colonel Tylden,	119
The great strain put on the powers of those who remained,	120
Colonel Tylden,	■■■
Thornton Grant,	120
Elphinstone,	120
Captain, now General Viscount Wolseley, G.C.B.,	121
Contests maintained by infantry between two opposite batteries,	■■■
Boudischieff's attack,	122
Alternations,	122
The English driving the Russians back into their fortress,	123
Attack made by the Volhynia regiment,	123
Its progress,	123
And final discomfiture,	123
Conditions under which our troops fought,	124
Colonel Shirley,	124
Another Russian column advancing to attempt the recapture,	124
Prostrate state of most of our men,	125
Show of resistance attempted by some officers and men,	125
Its effect,	126
The Russian column faltering and coming to a stop,	126
And falling back,	126
The English at break of day still retaining their hold,	126
The share Fortune had in bringing about this result,	126
Execution meanwhile of the needed works,	127
Colonel Campbell,	128
Captain Wolseley,	128

CHAPTER V.—continued.

VIII.

Killed, wounded, and missing, . . . . .	129
Spoils, . . . . .	129

IX.

The Allies on their advanced front, . . . . .	129
Change experienced by the garrison and inhabitants, . . . . .	129

X.

Continuance of the Third Bombardment, . . . . .	130
The losses it caused, . . . . .	130

CHAPTER VI.

THE SIEGE AND DEFENCE CARRIED ON TO THE CLOSE OF THE FOURTH BOMBARDMENT.

I.

Continued strife between the French Emperor and Péliſſier, . . . . .	131
Louis Napoleon unaware of the way in which his plan had collapsed, . . . . .	136
How the Emperor (against his own wishes) prevented all recourse to field operations, . . . . .	136
Course taken by Péliſſier, . . . . .	137

II.

The affliction endured by Péliſſier, . . . . .	137
Its apparent effect on his judgment during nearly eight days, . . . . .	138
Changes during the interval undergone by Péliſſier's mind, . . . . .	138
10th of June; full accord between Péliſſier and Lord Raglan, . . . . .	139
Péliſſier discarding the idea of assaulting the town front, . . . . .	139
His removal of Bosquet from command in the Karabelnaya, . . . . .	140

III.

Designed movement on the Tchernaya, . . . . .	142
Main design of the Allies against the Karabelnaya, . . . . .	142
Their plan of a preliminary bombardment, . . . . .	142

CHAPTER VI.—continued.

IV.

The fourth bombardment,	142
Reply of Russian batteries,	144
This regarded by the besiegers as weak,	144
The effect like that of a stratagem,	144
The Allies lulled into a faith that Sebastopol was ready to fall,	144
Exultant opinion in camp,	145
The force of this belief,	146
Its impact on the troubled mind of PéliSSier,	146
Lord Raglan sharing the belief of the camp,	146
But not moved towards change of plan.,	146

V.

Morning of Sunday the 17th, . . . . .	146
PéliSSier at the English headquarters,	147
Concerted plans of the two commanders,	147

VI.

PéliSSier's sudden change of purpose, . . . . .	148
Not imparted at the time to Lord Raglan, . . . . .	148
Its purport, . . . . .	148
Its bearing, . . . . .	149
Question why PéliSSier thus acted, . . . . .	150
His change imparted to our Chief Engineer, . . . . .	151
And by him to Lord Raglan, . . . . .	151
Lord Raglan's determination, . . . . .	151

VII.

Night of the 17th of June, . . . . .	152
Movements of English and French troops, . . . . .	152
These movements descried by the enemy, . . . . .	152
Bombardment at night by vertical fire, . . . . .	153
The enemy repairing and even augmenting his batteries,,	153

CHAPTER VII.

EIGHTEENTH OF JUNE.—ABORTIVE ATTACKS OF THE ALLIES ON THE KARABILWATA DEFENCES.—THE VICTORIOUS OPERATION EFFECTED BY ~~GENERAL~~

I.

The infantry of the garrison preparing to fulfil its task, . . . . .	164
The garrison made aware of the besiegers' designs, . . . . .	164
And preparing accordingly, . . . . .	164

II.

Pélissier's dispositions, . . . . .	165
-------------------------------------	-----

III.

Post chosen by Lord Raglan, . . . . .	156
Midnight at the French headquarters, . . . . .	157
Pélissier's personal movements, . . . . .	157
What he saw and heard before sunrise, . . . . .	157

IV.

General Meyran's premature attack, . . . . .	157
His death. Repulse of the column, . . . . .	158
Pélissier vainly launching his signal, . . . . .	159

V.

General Brunet's attack, . . . . .	160
His death, . . . . .	160
Repulse of the troops, . . . . .	161

VI.

General d'Autemarre's attack, . . . . .	161
French troops breaking into the fortress, . . . . .	162
The endeavour to reinforce them, . . . . .	164
This checked, . . . . .	164

VII.

The bearing of the hindrance encountered by d'Autemarre on Lord Raglan's course of action, . . . . .	165
Motives tending to govern Lord Raglan's decision, . . . . .	165
His resolve, . . . . .	167

CHAPTER VII.—continued.

VIII.

Measures for assaulting the Redan,	167
The two columns under Campbell and Yeo,	168
Sir George Brown in the immediate command,	168
But Lord Raglan present in person,	168

IX.

The column led by Campbell,	168
No means enabling the column to reach its chosen point of attack,	169
Advance of the covering party, the Engineers, and the bearers,	170
But not of the 'main column,'	170
The fire encountered,	170
The ladder-party,	171
Gerald Graham and the sailors,	171
Murray mortally wounded,	171
Interposition of Colonel Tylden,	172
Resulting in a move towards the salient of the Redan,	172
Intensity of the fire confronted by Tylden,	172
Who was quickly struck down,	172
Course taken by Gerald Graham,	172
Disappearance of the Rifles,	173
Non-appearance of the 'main column,'	173
What remained in this part of the field,	173
The ladder-party brought under shelter.,	173
The 'main column,'	173
The obstruction diverting it from the assigned course,	174
Course taken by the column,	174
Its actual and relative position when emerging,	174
Campbell's previous words to Graham,	175
His vain expectation of a fight,	175
Tudleben's policy,	176
General Campbell killed,	176
Colonel Shadforth killed,	176
Courses that might be taken by the 57th men,	176
The Artakoff Battery,	177
The Riflemen quitting their ground,	177
And forming up with some men of the main column and others,	177

CHAPTER VII.—continued.

The united force moving against the Artakoff Battery, . . . . .	177
Their subsequent course, . . . . .	178
Lord West acceding to the command, . . . . .	178
The resources at his disposal, . . . . .	179
His reluctance to believe that he was powerless to execute an attack, . . . . .	179
His direction to Gerald Graham, . . . . .	180
State and strength of the 'ladder-party,' . . . . .	180
The ladder-party under Graham, . . . . .	180
The admiration and approval bestowed on Graham and the sailors, .	181
The sole means at Lord West's disposal, . . . . .	181
His vain efforts, . . . . .	182
Orders sought and obtained, . . . . .	183
From Sir George Brown, . . . . .	183
The accidents which marred the advance of the column saved our troops from great sacrifices, . . . . .	183
Losses, . . . . .	184

X.

An impatient Lieutenant of Sappers, . . . . .	184
Allusion to his subsequent career, . . . . .	185

XL

Troops assembled and launched for attack on the eastern flank of the Redan, . . . . .	185
Composition and number of force under Yea, . . . . .	186
Strength of the column moving with him, . . . . .	186
Advance of the column, . . . . .	186
The works it confronted, . . . . .	187
The fire incurred by this column, . . . . .	187
The remains of the Riflemen coming up to the Abattis, . . . . .	189
And clinging to the ground they had won, . . . . .	189
Under a searching fire, . . . . .	190
'The Engineer officer' at the Abattis, . . . . .	190
The state of the 'ladder-party,' . . . . .	190
Duty of 'the Engineer officer,' . . . . .	191
Approach of Colonel Yea, . . . . .	191
Is accosted, but killed, . . . . .	191
Captain Jesse, too, accosted and killed, . . . . .	191
A like fatality overtaking others, . . . . .	192

CHAPTER VII.—continued.

Order given by 'the Engineer officer,' . . . . .	192
What to expect from the despatch of fresh troops, . . . . .	■■■
The duty of an officer in command, . . . . .	193
But on whom had the command devolved? . . . . .	193
A'Court Fisher, . . . . .	193
The course he took, . . . . .	193
Withdrawal of the remains of the troops, . . . . .	193
Just praise bestowed by the authorities on A'Court Fisher, . .	194
The loss of Colonel Yeo, . . . . .	194
And of other officers and of men, . . . . .	195
Advance and subsequent retreat of the supports, . . . . .	196

■■■

Fire drawn on our trenches, . . . . .	197
And especially on the spot where Lord Raglan was posted, . . . . .	197
His directions to the staff, . . . . .	197
His commanding Engineer torn from his side, . . . . .	197
Others stricken, . . . . .	198
The conditional measures, . . . . .	198

XIII.

The bombardment ordered by Lord Raglan, . . . . .	■■■
Its effect, . . . . .	198
Losses resulting from the assaults on the Redan, . . . . .	199

XIV.

Prospect opened by the success of the fire from the siege-guns, . . . . .	199
Lord Raglan and Péliéssier in communication, . . . . .	200
The two chiefs together, . . . . .	■■■
Messages from d'Autemarre, . . . . .	200

XV

Continued operations of d'Autemarre's troops, . . . . .	200
---------------------------------------------------------	-----

XVI.

Péliéssier, . . . . .	■■■
His resolve to abandon the struggle, . . . . .	205

XVII.

The movement on the Tchernaya, . . . . .	205
------------------------------------------	-----

CHAPTER VII.—*continuedXVIII.

The attack led by General Eyre, . . . . .	205
-------------------------------------------	-----

XIX.

Losses sustained in the engagements of the 18th of June, . . . . .	208
--------------------------------------------------------------------	-----

XX.

The high merit of the Russian defence, . . . . .	209
Prince Gortchakoff's statements, . . . . .	210

XXI.

Pelissier's explanations, . . . . .	211
The real cause of his failure, . . . . .	211
Todleben's comments, . . . . .	213

XXII.

Costliness of General Eyre's victory in proportion to the advantages gained, . . . . .	215
----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	-----

CHAPTER VIII.

SEBASTOPOL AFTER THE ENGAGEMENT.—GENERAL TODLEBEN WOUNDED.
—THE DEFENCE OF SEBASTOPOL.

I.

The veil between warring armies, . . . . .	216
Between Sebastopol and its besiegers, . . . . .	216
The garrison. Its achievement, . . . . .	217
Its actual state of feeling towards the close of the engagement, . . . . .	217
The Czar's infantry in grave need of encouragement, . . . . .	219
Whence apparently the fabrication of the 18th of June, . . . . .	219
Thanksgivings, . . . . .	220
Just right of the garrison to indulge in self-gratulation, . . . . .	220

II.

Todleben wounded, . . . . .	221
And removed from Sebastopol, . . . . .	221
The part he still took, . . . . .	221

CHAPTER VIII.—continued.

The way in which, until wounded, he had brought his power to bear, . . . . .	222
The difference caused by his removal, . . . . .	222
No thanksgivings thenceforth for the Russians, . . . . .	223
But approaching defeat in the field, . . . . .	223
The position of Todleben in Sebastopol, . . . . .	223
And in the war generally, . . . . .	224

III.

The glory attaching to the early defence of Sebastopol, . . . . .	229
This kept veiled from the Russians themselves, . . . . .	229
Words recalling the early defence of Sebastopol, . . . . .	232
Inferences to be drawn from the early defence of Sebastopol, . .	234
Defence of Sebastopol after the 17th of October, . . . . .	234
Todleben, . . . . .	234
His superlative part in the war, . . . . .	235
The maxim twice over refuted by the early defenders of Sebastopol, . . . . .	236
His personal glory disengaged from the subsequent reverses of Russia, . . . . .	237

CHAPTER IX.

PÉLISSIER AFTER HIS DISCOMFITURE.

The distressing position in which Pélissier stood, . . . . .	238
Increased means of acting against him acquired by the Emperor, . .	239
Pélissier's strength in adversity, . . . . .	239
The resources he disclosed, . . . . .	240
Opportune and successful endeavours of the English Government to check the Emperor's interposition, . . . . .	240
Bosquet brought back to his former command on the Heights, . .	241
And his opinion adopted by the Chief, . . . . .	241
His resolve, . . . . .	242
And brought to bear with effect, . . . . .	242
Danger of the strife between Louis Napoleon and Pélissier, . .	242
The happily exerted qualities of Marshal Vaillant, . . . . .	242
The power he wielded over the Emperor, . . . . .	243
His tone towards Pélissier, . . . . .	243

CHAPTER IX.—continued.

Success of Vaillant's efforts to prevent a rupture, . . . . .	245
His endeavours to solace and pacify Niel, . . . . .	245
Long concealment of the truth by the French Government, . . . . .	245
Pelissier, . . . . .	246
His distinct individuality, . . . . .	246
His great worth as a statesman upholding the great Alliance, . .	246
And resisting his Emperor's interference in the conduct of the war, . . . . .	247
As a commander in war, . . . . .	249

CHAPTER X.

LORD RAGLAN: HIS (OF LATE) SMOOTH RELATIONS WITH THE HOME GOVERNMENT.—THE AFFLITION HE SUFFERED FROM THE DISAPPOINTMENT AND LOSSES SUSTAINED ON THE 18TH OF JUNE.—HIS VITAL STRENGTH APPEARING TO GIVE WAY.—HIS GRIEF AT THE LOSS OF GENERAL ESTCOURT.—A SLIGHT AILMENT APPROVING THE CHIEF.

I.

The Home Government co-operating harmoniously with Lord Raglan, . . . . .	252
---------------------------------------------------------------------------	-----

II.

Lord Raglan afflicted by the disappointment and losses sustained on the 18th of June, . . . . .	257
Lord Raglan's vital strength seeming to give way, . . . . .	258
The strain that had been put upon him, . . . . .	258
What within less than a year he had endured and achieved, . .	258
Yet this only one epoch in a glorious life, . . . . .	264
The belief that care had been sapping his vital strength, . .	264
The change in his outward appearance, . . . . .	266

III.

Lord Raglan afflicted by the death of General Estcourt, . . .	266
---------------------------------------------------------------	-----

IV.

23d June. Lord Raglan unwell, . . . . .	267
But not prevented from transacting laborious business, . .	267
And not confined to his house, . . . . .	267

CHAPTER XL

CONTINUING SIEGE OPERATIONS.

The French sapping more closely up to the works in the Karabulnaya,	270
And preparing to establish new batteries on ground commanding the Roadstead,	270
The English strengthening their hold of ground captured by Eyre,	270
And afterwards handing it over to the charge of the French,	271
Continuance of the mining and counter-mining operations,	271
The moral effect attributed by the Russians to their vigorous counter-mining,	272

CHAPTER XII.

LORD RAGLAN'S INSISTENCE ON CHANGES IN THE PLAN OF THE SIEGE.

Memorandum of the 21st of June,	274
Sent to the French Headquarters,	274
Objections to plans involving attacks on the Great Redan,	275
More especially if the Flagstaff Bastion were not to be also assailed,	276
Assaults on the Redan from a distance out of harmony with the new French design,	276
Words from Lord Raglan showing the course he meant to take,	277
The Conference of the 24th held,	277
Two of the subjects known to have been there brought forward,	277
The grounds for anxiety they must have seemingly given,	278
What passed at the Conference!	278
Abrupt ceasing of the light shed till now by Lord Raglan's despatches,	279
The position of England in conference of an anxious kind with the Chief of 100,000 men,	279
Signs that Lord Raglan was prevailing,	279
Niel's Note of the 25th of June,	280
The real conclusion deducible from Niel's answer of the 26th of June,	281
Continuance for some days of the better siege prospects opened to our army,	281

CHAPTER XII.—continued.

Presumption that in this matter Lord Raglan must have seen his way, . . . . .	281
Circumstances now enabling Lord Raglan to act on Péliſſier cogently, . . . . .	282
Circumstances tending to show that Lord Raglan in this matter had before him a fair prospect of success, . . . . .	288
But not (in his place) any other, . . . . .	288

CHAPTER XIII.

THE DEATH OF LORD RAGLAN.

The last despatch of Lord Raglan, . . . . .	284
His illness, . . . . .	285
His faintly uttered words to General Airey, . . . . .	285
His last hours and death, . . . . .	286
Expression of his countenance after death, . . . . .	287
Generals and Admirals next day in the chamber of death, . . . . .	287
Péliſſier's agony of grief, . . . . .	288
Official announcements and condolences, . . . . .	288
Private letter of condolence from the Queen to Lady Raglan, . . . . .	291
The void caused by Lord Raglan's death, . . . . .	293
This acutely felt by the officer who succeeded to the command, . . . . .	293
Immediate evil to our army resulting from Lord Raglan's death, . . . . .	294
Abrupt abandonment of the negotiation he had opened with Péliſſier, . . . . .	294
Loss of weight in Anglo-French council, resulting from the death of Lord Raglan, . . . . .	295
The sorrow of our troops, . . . . .	296
The example of Lord Raglan chosen as a guide, . . . . .	296
Grief of Admiral Lyons and our seamen, . . . . .	296
Feeling of the Sardinian army, . . . . .	297
And of Omar Pasha, . . . . .	297
Péliſſier's celebrated General Order, . . . . .	297
Feeling of the French army generally towards Lord Raglan, . . . . .	298
The mortal remains of Lord Raglan conveyed with military honours to the Bay of Kazatch, . . . . .	301

APPENDIX

NOTES TO CHAPTER I.

1. Allies of the Sultan, . . . . .	307
2. Feared to displease, . . . . .	307

NOTES TO CHAPTER II

1. Once more recaptured the Work, . . . . .	307
2. By first reducing the Malakoff, . . . . .	308

NOTES TO CHAPTER III.

1. Investing the place, . . . . .	308
2. With scorn, and with victory, . . . . .	308

NOTES TO CHAPTER IV.

1. Destroyed them, . . . . .	308
2. For the protection of their lives and property, . . . . .	309
3. The piteous screaming of women, . . . . .	309
4. Meant to defend the place, . . . . .	309
5. That that last vessel perished, . . . . .	309
6. Harm to the town, . . . . .	309
7. To refrain altogether from sending it,	309
8. His sovereign's imperious mandate, . . . . .	310
9. Proved able to set him aside, . . . . .	310
10. Protest against every such measure, . . . . .	310

NOTES TO CHAPTER V.

1. Havoc and ruin, . . . . .	310
2. Accepted the Prince's bold story, . . . . .	310
3. Respecting Skaratine, see Note in the Appendix, . . . . .	311
4. Will attempt a recapture, . . . . .	311
5. To retake the counter-approaches, . . . . .	311
6. Had been definitively won, . . . . .	311

APPENDIX—continued.*NOTES TO CHAPTER VI.

1. Nothing that the Emperor ordered, . . . . .	811
2. 'By orders of the English Government,' . . . . .	811
3. Might be well carried into effect, . . . . .	812
4. Of all the projected assaults, . . . . .	813
5. Confined to only a few score of men, . . . . .	814

NOTES TO CHAPTER VII.

1. Scarce exceeding, he thought, 160, . . . . .	813
2. A grape-shot striking his forehead, . . . . .	813
3. By a wisely designed cannonade, . . . . .	813
4. Only some 2000 strong, . . . . .	813
5. These engagements of the 18th of June, . . . . .	813
6. Were thrown back into the ditches, . . . . .	814

NOTE TO CHAPTER VIII.

1. By their sacred costumes, . . . . .	815
----------------------------------------	-----

NOTE TO CHAPTER X.

1. Harmonious concert, . . . . .	815
----------------------------------	-----

NOTES TO CHAPTER XIII.

1. Grace and perfect clearness of style, . . . . .	816
2. Was no worse, . . . . .	816
3. Appeal to Heaven, . . . . .	816
4. Fresh disappointments and losses, . . . . .	816
5. On board the Caradoe, . . . . .	817

---

INDEX TO THE WHOLE WORK, . . . . .	819
------------------------------------	-----

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS TO VOL. IX.

MAP I. SEVASTOPOL, WITH THE EASTERN COUNTER-APPROACHES,	Frontispiece
II. SCENE OF THE FIGHT MAINTAINED BY PELLISSIER AFTER ACCORDING TO THE SUPREME COMMAND.—THE COUNTER-APPROACHES TOWARDS THE CEMETERY DOWN TO THE 22D OF MAY,	to face page 14
III. THE KERTCHINSKIY PENINSULA,	n n 40
IV. THE SEA OF AZOV, AND NEIGHBOURING LANDS,	n n 62
V. THE ENGAGEMENT OF THE 7TH OF JUNE,	n n 100
VI. ABORTIVE ATTACKS OF THE 18TH OF JUNE ON THE KARABELNAYA ECHINTE,	n n 158
VII. THE RUSSIAN POSITION ATTACKED AND CAPTURED BY GENERAL EVER, ON THE 18TH OF JUNE,	n n 206

Google

Digitized by University of Michigan

FROM THE
OPENING OF PÉLISSIER'S COMMAND TO THE DEATH OF LORD RAGLAN.

---

CHAPTER I.

THE NEW FRENCH COMMANDER AND THE PROSPECTS OF VIGOROUS ACTION WHICH HIS LEADERSHIP SEEMED TO BE OPENING.—THE STRENGTH OF THE BELLIGER-ENTS.—THE PROBLEM AWAITING SOLUTION.—THE RESOLVES OF PÉLISSIER.—THE IMPENDING STRIFE BETWEEN HIM AND THE EMPEROR.

L

ON the 19th of May, the command of the now great French army was assumed in due form by Pélissier. This short, thick-set, resolute Norman had passed his sixtieth year; but the grey, the fast whitening hair that capped his powerful head, and marked the inroads of Time, wore a strange, wore an alien look, as though utterly out of true fellowship with the keen, fiery, vehement eyes, with the still dark and heavy mous-

VOL. IX.

CHAP. L tache, with all the imperious features that glowed, or seemed to be glowing in the prime, or fierce mid-day of life. His mighty bull-neck, strongly built upon broad, massive shoulders, gave promise of hard, bloody fights, gave warning of angry moods, and even of furious outbursts.

He however, it seems, could at pleasure unleash or control his fierce rage, thus treating wrath as a power that he knew how to wield, and not suffering the strong, useful demon to have a real mastery over him. He was capable of choosing and loyally pursuing a policy. He had Norman-like gifts that well fitted him to throw his antagonists in many a wrestle for power, and to make him a chief strong in war. His accustomed manner of speech, though so forcible, and so freely unbridled as to be in a sense dramatic, was after all—not a mask, but—the genuine, though boisterous utterance of a violent, absolute man. When first meeting in conference one who, though only then commanding a corps, still expended a huge force in speech, Lord Raglan was apparently startled, if not even a little repelled, and could not help telling his Government that Pélissier 'talked a good deal'; but he even then said, that the general so eager to speak seemed also eager to act, and he happily found before long that the Norman was 'as good as his word.'

In one respect, it is true, Pélissier's demeanour and speech tended strongly to mislead an observer; for, whether owing to whim or to exuberant strength, he greatly liked putting on what—apparently by a sort of convention—is accepted as the 'roughness of camps,' though all the while in reality he was a man of high cultivation, and, moreover, one versed in those duties—the duties, I mean, of 'staff' service—which try the brain-power of officers engaged in the business of war. With the aid of such training as this, he had become fully capable of having or quickly acquiring the kind of statesmanship needed by one in the exalted position of commanding a splendid French army assembled in the enemy's presence, and, for instance, understood, to begin with, how best to maintain honest concert with the English allies at his side.

CHAP.
L

Without speaking except by mere reference of his achievements in Algeria, or recurring by more than allusion to even the caves of the Dahra, or repeating what already we have seen of his victorious self-assertion maintained against what was then lawful authority, one can say of this stubborn commander that, whether pressing hostilities by a normal exertion of power, or straining his warlike prerogatives to a questioned extreme, or bringing new life to an army benumbed by want of sound leadership, he never ceased to disclose a strong and persistent will.* He was specially apt for those trials which have to be borne by a general engaged in an obstinate siege,

* A passing mention of the 'caves of the Dahra' appears ante, vol. ii. pp. 159 and 160. The last allusion in the above sentence is to Pélissier's wilful and victorious course of action, recounted ante, vol. vii., chap. viii., pp. 205 et seq.

CHAP. since he knew how to make cruel sacrifices for the attainment of many an object small enough at first sight in itself, yet forming one in a series of steps leading up to the end.

He was by nature so manful, and—with justice—reposed in himself so unstinted a confidence, that—now in his sixty-first year—he could not apparently learn to become a respecter of persons set up in authority over him, and indeed had the air of regarding them with feelings scarce short of disdain. Untainted by any complicity in the plot of the 2d of December, and brought honestly up to the front by the strength of his warlike repute, he, when only commanding a corps, had been bold enough, as we saw, to begin protecting the army from Louis Napoleon's strategy;* and there well might be good hope that now, with his vastly extended power, he would firmly pursue a like course. Thus the man and the occasion were meeting. What France beyond all measure needed for the honour of her arms was a general (otherwise competent) who could and would push on the war without deferring unduly to her troublesome Emperor, and Péliſſer fulfilled the condition.

II.

Accord between Péliſſer and Lord
Raglan.

Upon acceding to the command, he thus addressed the War Minister:—‘I have already seen ‘Lord Raglan. Upon our general course of action ‘we are in perfect accord. In common with the * See ante, vol. viii., his letter of the 6th of May, p. 285.

' whole army I have entire faith in the future.
 ' I thank the Emperor for the confidence he re-
 ' poses in me. I have measured the extent of ' my great duties; but in order that I may fulfil
 ' them with success for any length of time, you ' must ask the Emperor to give me the latitude
 ' and freedom of action that are indispensable
 ' under the conditions presented by this present
 ' war, and especially necessary for preserving the ' close alliance between the two countries.'*

CHAP.
I.

Put discretion demanded.

Whilst Pélissier and Lord Raglan agreed on the questions then needing solution, there was also a well-founded hope that such differences of opinion as might afterwards spring up between them would be easily prevented from marring their power to act in due concert. To begin with, the new French commander, when acceding to power, seemed to hang on the words of his English colleague with an eagerness and a kind of devotion that he rarely if ever vouchsafed to any one other man; but, if swayed and won over (as indeed all men more or less were) by the personal ascendant of Lord Raglan, Pélissier had moreover convictions in harmony with the feelings he showed. He had the wisdom—State wisdom—enabling him to see the vital conditions on which the blessing of concord could best be attained and secured.

Prospect of the two generals being able to act in full concert.

Lord Raglan, we know, on the other hand, was richly endowed with the faculty—the noble, the generous faculty—which enables one man to * Bouvet, vol. ii. p. 183.

CHAP.
L appreciate the rights, the fair claims, the natural feelings of others. From the first, he had well understood that, supposing the French army to be ably and honestly led, its chief (from the nature of things) might fairly claim more sway in council than one who only commanded a much less numerous force; and common-sense also showed that in conference between the two chiefs, he to whom any project might tender what men call 'the labouring oar' would have a better right than his colleague to govern the joint resolve. Thus, for instance, Lord Raglan conceived that (along with the Ottoman army) French cavalry and other French troops might advantageously operate from Eupatoria against the enemy's rear; yet, because the proposal was one which sought to choose a new enterprise for some of Péliſſier's troops, he, Péliſſier, had a right to expect that any distaste for the measure which he might avow would be suffered, as of course, to prevail.

Both the chiefs, one may say, on the whole understood the true kind of relations that ought to be subsisting between them; and the time had now seemingly come when, unless our French allies should be hampered by the interference of Louis Napoleon, the armies of the two Western Powers might be acting as though they were one.

The spirit of concord thus ruling the French and the English headquarters carried with it the co-operation of the Sardinian contingent (placed, we saw, under Lord Raglan's guidance), and was also to be expected with the Sardinian contingent;

Concord

destined besides to ensure the willing aid of the CHAP.
Ottoman forces in the Crimea; for by use of his <sup>L.</sup> mighty ascendant at Constantinople, Lord Stratford would soon be restoring the good-humour of Omar Pasha, and inclining him to act in smooth concert with the English allies of the Sultan.<sup>(1)</sup> and with Omar

Pasha

III.

Exclusive of non-combatants, the forces that might thus be expected to act together harmoniously in the south of the Crimea comprised (with the 'Corps of Reserve'**) 100,000 French, 28,000 English, 15,000 Sardinians, and 45,000 Turks, making together 188,000 men.

strength of
the Allies,

To—not merely collect and despatch from afar, but to—throw forward into the presence of a distant enemy, and firmly establish in front of him 188,000 good troops, whilst also supporting this host by fleets of great strength that held absolute command of the seas, and could cover the landing of troops on any chosen part of the coast—this was bringing to bear on Sebastopol

* Which had partly come up from Constantinople, and would be all on the Chersonese within a few days.

† Niel's calculation, given by Rousset, vol. ii. p. 190, but with a correction adding 3000 to his estimate of the English combative force. The 'Situation' of the French army (20th May 1855, Niel, App., p. 491), puts its gross numbers at 120,096, and shows a strength of 100,426 'disponibles.' With their 'indisponibles,' the French in round and gross numbers had 120,000, the English 32,000, the Sardinians 17,000, and the Turks, under Omar Pasha, 55,000—making up altogether for the Allies a gross number of 224,000 men.

CHAP.
L
~~of the
■■■■■~~ a mighty exertion of power; and, on the other hand, it would seem that in the whole of the Crimea, exclusive of its Kertchine Peninsula, where 9000 troops were assembled, the enemy could now only reckon some 80,000 infantry, with 12,000 cavalry, and 214 pieces of field artillery.*

IV.

The problem to be solved by the Allies

So, if only the Allies at this time had been free from the knot which still tied them to their siege of Sebastopol, they would seemingly have been able at once to reinvoke the Crimea, to fasten upon it in strength from east to west, and with ease, or comparative ease, to reduce a fortress so weak on its northern front as to be there almost powerless against them, whilst lying besides at their mercy, because altogether cut off (by the supposed reinvasion) from its vital communications with Russia by either the land or the sea. But no such freedom belonged to the powerful yet fettered Allies. They had not yet expiated the fault of sitting down as besiegers before the south front of Sebastopol. Irresistible reasons, we know, forbade them all thought of enduring that their siege-works or their ports of supply should fall into the enemy's hands.† Yet, fitly to guard these possessions was a task, as we saw, ascertained to require 90,000 men, of whom all were perforce to be French, or French and English combined.* Hugely changed by this exigency, CHAP.

* Todleben, vol. ii. p. 253.

† As shown ante, vol. viii. p. 284.

the problem no longer asked simply how best to conquer Sebastopol, but how best to attempt this concurrently with the furnishing of 90,000 men for another imperative task.

To answer the problem thus put, widely different solutions were offered.

With the bulk of the 98,000 men that would still be left after furnishing the guard of 90,000, and also leaving a garrison at Eupatoria, it was possible to undertake field operations which might force the enemy to relax his hold of Sebastopol; but every such project involved a more or less widened severance of the Allied forces.

It also was possible to avoid all such sever-ances by simply pressing the siege, and this plan had the evident merit of compressing, as it were, into one the heavy task of defence and the less heavy task of conquest; so that under a project thus ordered, the whole mass of the 188,000 men (saving only a garrison for Eupatoria) might be kept together in an assembled state. To accept that alternative, however, was to make a distressing choice, for it involved the continuance of a siege to be pressed at cruel sacrifice of life against the now immensely strong front of an uninvested fortress, with all Russia at its back; and it sanctioned what, under one aspect, might pass for a huge waste of power, since, as long as the siege might endure, an enormous proportion of the 188,000 Allies,

* See ante, vol. viii. p. 295.

CHAP. though gathered and ready for battle, would still be so circumstanced on the Chersonese and the neighbouring plain as to be able to do little or nothing towards bringing the strife to a close.

V.

Pélissier's
resolves.

Yet, with all its repulsiveness Pélissier preferred this last plan. He declined to undertake operations against the Russian field army, whether hazarded (as the Emperor urged) by effecting an advance from Aloushta, or attacking from ground further west, or again (as Lord Raglan had counselled) by directing a movement from Eupatoria against the enemy's rear. He determined to go on waging war against the south side of Sebastopol by the simple, though bloody expedient of resolutely pressing the siege; and, finally, he meant or desired that, till after the end of this siege, the bulk of the four Allied armies should remain held together like one. It is true that (in concert with Lord Raglan) Pélissier determined to resume the Kertch expedition, and (for many good reasons) agreed that—employing for the purpose their cavalry, and other bodies of troops not engaged in the work of the siege—the Allies should take ground to their right in the valley of the Tchernaya; but the first of these operations was to be one of only brief duration, and the other one harmonised perfectly with that part of Pélissier's design which required—however anomalously—that, although so placed and confronted as to be unable to bring the enemy CHAP.

I. to the ordeal of a general action, the bulk of the vast Allied army should still for the time remain concentrated. Having laid it down peremptorily in his letter of the 5th of May that the field operations imagined against the enemy's rear must all be put off till the fortress should be reduced to a strict defensive, the new French commander now carried his principle further, and declared that the Allies must adventure on no such enterprises until after effecting the conquest of the whole south side of Sebastopol.

Though immediate resort to the field operations had been urged—was still urged—by the Emperor, Pélissier extended no mercy to any such projects, denounced them as 'widely eccentric,' called them even in his scorn mere 'adventures,' and declared that, instead of the knowledge required for the invading the mountainous region of the Tchatir Dagh with an enemy gathered behind it, there was hardly any knowledge at all, not even any trustworthy map.

Pélissier laid it down that the conquest of the south side of Sebastopol must be effected by grappling fast with its defences, and carrying them one after the other at all costs. Exactly as Lord Raglan had counselled, Pélissier, to begin with, insisted that all those counter-approaches in the Karabel Faubourg to which Canrobert had so long been submitting must be forcibly wrested from the enemy.

In this stern design against the 'South Side'

CHAP. I.—there was nothing that allured (like a battle) the rapt imaginations of men by opening a vision of glory attainable perhaps before sunset after going through only the ordeal of fights fought out in hot blood. Far from thinking that the path he had chosen was an easy, or a swift way to victory, Pélissier saw in it a course beset with evils and troubles, one involving cruel sacrifices, and after all, not even promising to compass without further efforts that long-pursued object of objects for which the Allies were in arms. It was only from that future campaign which would open, he took it for granted, after the fall of the 'South Side' that Pélissier hoped to educe a not unworthy result. What he said for his plan of first pushing war to extremity against the 'South Side' was simply this:—that its execution, however difficult, however costly of life, was still in his judgment 'possible.'*

In a powerful letter addressed to General Bosquet, Pélissier declared his resolves, and did this, one may say, in the language of one who gives final judgment, as though it were matter of course that what he (in accord with Lord Raglan) had determined to do must and would be accordingly done. He did not, he could not say that his plans had been approved by his sovereign, nor again did he—even for form's sake—write any word tending to show that his resolve would be submitted to the Emperor. On the contrary, he wrote as a man whose word was perforce to be

* Rousset, vol. ii. p. 184 et seq.

law. 'I am firmly determined,' he said, 'not to CHAP.
' launch into the unknown, to avoid adventures,
' and not to act without knowledge of what I am ' doing, or without the documents and the infor' mation necessary for the rational leadership of ' an army.' Speaking of the counter-approaches in the Faubourg still held by the Russians, he said in four words: 'We must have them'; and then, after giving his reasons for this decision, he said: 'All this may be painfully difficult, but it ' is possible, and to undertake it I am irrevocably
' determined. Such also is the opinion of the ' other Commanders-in-Chief.' *

Here then was the will of Pélissier declared to be fixed as Fate.

In words no less absolute—but these last, were they soundly prophetic of real achievements to come, or even indeed of the steadfastness of Pélissier's resolve?—the writer went on to announce that ulterior autumn campaign which was to be brought within reach by first going through the siege ordeal. 'The South Side,' he wrote, 'of ' Sebastopol being once taken, its resources carried ' off, and parked in our fortified ports of Balaclava
' and Kamiesh, the arsenal, the stocks destroyed,
' and thrown into the sea, the remains of the ' Russian fleet sunk, we shall leave on the Cher' sonese from 15,000 to 20,000 men, and with
' 130,000 shall execute an autumn campaign, un-
' trammelled by other tasks, and, if it please God,
' with some glory.'

* Rousset, vol. ii. p. 184 et seq.

CHAP.
I.

Prospect of violent strife between Louis Napoleon and Pélissier.

On the other hand, Louis Napoleon was violently, indignantly adverse to all idea of providing that the field operations should be preceded by the capture of the South Side; and it might seem that the authority of an absolute sovereign would perforce govern one of his generals; but the Emperor, as we know, always lived under that peculiar dread of offending his army which from time to time overrode what—only the moment before—had been his settled decisions, and was destined to involve him in ruin, along with not only his 'Empire' but even that very army which he had feared to displease.<sup>(*)</sup> He apparently knew or believed that, to depose Pélissier would be giving offence to his army on the Chersonese, and to his army in Algeria, but also—this above all to his sensitive army at home; and accordingly we shall soon have to see him commanding, commanding, commanding, without being therefore for a moment obeyed, yet may, after all, not find him ready to vindicate his outraged authority by any ulterior steps. There are signs that Marshal Vaillant the Minister of War perceived, nay, recognised this as the actual state of what purported to be the governing power;* and perhaps some such light reached Pélissier; for, whilst steadily setting at nought the Emperor's orders, he had the air of obeying some esoteric authority which showed him his path of duty—which taught him that he—he alone—must bear the whole burthen of commanding the French in

* See post, chap. ix., Vaillant's use of the impersonal 'on.'

W.H. [initials]

4 February
[Redacted]
[Redacted]

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

this war, and could not hope to excuse himself for CHAP.
any disastrous fault by alleging instructions re- L.
ceived from his sovereign Louis Napoleon.

Be all this as it may, the French Emperor at the time we have reached was about to be plying his distant and strong-willed general with censure, with indignant reproaches, with peremptory words of command ; so that, whilst we are observing the conflict between the Allies and the Czar, we also shall have to be witnessing the interior strife going on between Napoleon the Third and Pélissier.

The Emperor, as we saw, had in Niel a delegate long since established at the French Headquarters whose obedience to his master was supported by his own real convictions, and a strenuous desire to press, to force their adoption on him who now ruled the French army ; but it would seem that this aid on the whole did not bring a real strength to the Emperor ; for the presence of a general undertaking to criticise and even oppose the measures of the Commander-in-Chief was beyond measure exasperating to the fiery Pélissier, and by acting thus on his temper may plainly have strengthened his will.

CHAPTER II.

NEW COUNTER-APPROACHES AND CONSEQUENT FIGHTS ON THE WESTERN FLANK OF SEBASTOPOL.

I.

CHAP. II. THE march of the siege where it threatened the western front of Sebastopol was all at once brought to a crisis which called on the new French commander to open his reign with some fights.

The Cimetièr Ridge.

General Todleben had already established a chain of lodgments extending along the Cimetière Ridge; and the French on their part by this time had brought their approaches close up to the southernmost wall of the graveyard from which the Ridge took its name.

Now, because having relative height, and besides running parallel with the enceinte of Sebastopol at a distance of but 500 yards, the Cimetière Ridge thus held lightly by the enemy's lodgments, and thus approached by the French, was a position of great military value. If seized by the French, it would enable them to operate formidably against the Central Bastion; whilst again, if the fortune of war should leave it in Todleben's power, he might be expected to plant on it batteries destructive of the French approaches, and indeed, one may say, would be able to stop the advance of the siege as then pressed against western Sebastopol.

CHAP.
II.

It might well have been therefore conjectured that, to secure the advantages offered, one or other of the opposing forces would very soon pass into action; but what happened was that they both by chance took their measures on the same night—the night of the 21st of May. It was then that our Allies pushed forward a trench by which they hoped in due time to be able to envelop the lodgments. It was then that the Russians began their boldly imagined enterprise.

Measures for securing it taken by the French
and the Russians.

II.

General Todleben in truth had projected a new <sup>Todleben's project;</sup> and great counter-approach which was to establish a fortified 'Place d'armes' on all the great tract of ground which divided the enceinte of Sebastopol from the furthest or western slopes of the Cimetière Ridge. He at once, to begin with, would carry a trench along the front of most (not quite all) of the Cimetière lodgments, and besides, at its southern extremity, would connect this new counter-approach with the enceinte of Sebastopol by a gabionnaded way.

General Khrouleff too had his project, and desired that some lodgments established near the head of the Quarantine Bay should be also con-

CHAP. nected by trench-work. The chiefs in Sebastopol saw that plans such as these were well calculated to provoke bloody fights, and might entail heavy sacrifices; but—although not unanimously—the proposals of both Todleben and Khrouleff were adopted by a Council of War.

Both the projects adopted;
and executed in the night of the 21st, resulting in;

the Cimeti-ière counter-approach;
and the Bay-head entrench-
ment.

Accordingly, in the night of the 21st of May, the two systems of projected trench-work were successfully executed, and, before morning came, the 'two chains of lodgments' had been already fore-trenched by continuous lines of defence. The Cimetière trench alone could hold two battalions of troops; and its southern extremity was now duly linked to the fortress by a well-covered line of way.

So, at dawn on the 22d, our Allies saw the fortress expanding, nay already expanded, before them; since, where yesterday there had only been strings of the lodgments our people called 'rifle-pits,' there now ranged however deficient in point of room and solidity—continuous lines of defence which 'annexed,' as it were, to Sebastopol a new, and great tract of land.

III.

Pélissier:

Now Pélissier—intent on the Faubourg—had no mind to carry Sebastopol by breaking in through its town front; and he well may have seen with regret that this Russian challenge invited him to conflicts on ground lying far from the principal path by which he would march to his object; but alive to the value of a powerful diversion, he, at this time, was plainly resolved that, short of storming Sebastopol, he would always carry on the 'old siege'—the siege of Sebastopol town—with unrelenting vigour; and perhaps one may safely infer that also he hearkened a little to that fiery temper, that warlike spirit of his which threatened him with the pains of self-scorn, if he brooked any counter-approaches. At all events, he determined that on the following night—it was only at night that he could act so close under the guns of Sebastopol—both of these two new counter-approaches should be resolutely attacked. The Russians became aware of the on-slaughts impending, and on each side the day of the 22d was passed in preparing for the strife, but especially in making beforehand such use of the artillery power as—in one direction or other—might help to govern the issue. For example, the French siege-guns raged against the Central Bastion, because the work was so placed that—not silenced perhaps by the darkness—its guns might interpose in the fight.

CHAP.
II.

His resolve to attack the counter-approaches on the night of the 22d.

Preparation on both sides for the night encounter.

IV.

It was with bodies of infantry some 6000 strong on each side that the French and the Russians respectively undertook to contend for the mastery of these two counter-approaches. General Paté, with under him General Beuret and General Motterouge, was to be in command of the French undertaking these night attacks.

Strength of the troops about to be engaged.

CHAP.
II.

Attack and capture of the Bay-head counter-approach.

At about half-past nine in the evening, General Beuret led out a force of between three and four battalions against the counter-approach near the head of the Quarantine Bay, and wrested it without serious difficulty from the very few Russians who were there for the moment in charge; but the enemy soon brought up some troops fully equal in strength to the French, and then there ensued a hard fight, the ebb and the flow so alternating that for a time, not computed by any at less than two hours, the issue seemed hanging in doubt. The French however at length made good their ascendant, drove the enemy out of the work, and—reversing its parapet—soon made the entrenchment their own.

V.

The Cimtière counter-approach.

Auxiliary
cannonade.

The Central Bastion under fire of the French
siege-guns.

But the principal subject of strife was the counter-approach which had fastened along the Cimetière Ridge.

To support his design of attacking this new Work with infantry, Pélassier took care to bombard every part of the Russian enceinte which stood near enough to be sharing in the expected fights. His artillery raged so destructively against the batteries of the Central Bastion and the adjacent works that they were, some of them, silenced, and all, it seems, brought to a nearly helpless condition; but Todleben in person came up to the Bastion, caused the dead and the wounded gunners to be replaced by fresh men, caused the choked embrasures to be cleared, and CHAP. II

in short restored to the batteries some at least of their fighting capacity.

At half-past nine o'clock in the evening, battalions commanded by Motterouge advanced from their sap on the flank of Todleben's new counter-approach; and, the Work being then only occupied by about 70 men, was easily seized by the French, who thereupon established themselves in front of the lodgments, thus covering those of their working parties, which had begun to transform the entrenchment; but 'formidable masses of Russians' (it is Péliſſier who speaks) came up from the ravine below, and, fighting with an extraordinary obstinacy, proved able to recapture the Work.

Then, however, advancing once more with numbers increased, and with resolute purpose, the French threw their strength on the flank of the counter-approach, swept the enemy out of its precincts from end to end, and drove him down the acclivity of the Zarogodnaia Ravine. The Russian losses were heavy, and included General Adlerberg, who was killed.

Then Colonel Gardner (an officer of the Russian Engineers*) disclosed an inborn capacity for swaying an infantry fight. Despatched with a fresh

* I felt prone to infer from his name that this brilliant officer must be of Scotch or English extraction; but I learn that he was of Teuton descent, and born in one of the Baltic provinces. He, however, was thoroughly Russian.

CHAP. II. battalion, he rallied the fugitives scattered in the Zarogodnaia Ravine, restored them to order, inspired them with fresh warlike ardour, and intrepidly led the whole body, then gladly accepting his guidance to another attack on the Cimetière counter-approach, and delivered this return onslaught with so great a vigour that the French once again were driven out of the Work, and even pursued in their flight along the trench they had opened on the night of the 21st.

Without waiting for the need that might be occasioned by the next alternation of fortune, General Khrouleff reinforced his battalions whilst still victorious with a fresh body of troops not less than 600 strong.

8th attack
on the
Work. Not shaken, however, in purpose, the French brought up their reserves—troops including the Voltigeurs of the Guard—and executed a determined attack on the long-disputed counter-approach. The onslaught, however, was met with strenuous resistance, with strenuous counter-attacks; and the strife that resulted was maintained on each side with rare obstinacy. ‘The ‘bayonet milles,’ says Pélissier, ‘were terrible. ‘Two other battalions of Voltigeurs of the Guard, ‘the 9th Chasseurs à pied, and the 8th of the Line, ‘were called to the ground.’

The strain put on the French raised a need for, as sea-captains word it, ‘All hands!’ Till now, held in readiness to ‘transform’ the entrenchment when captured, the men of their ‘working-parties’ were swift to lay down their tools, to stand to their arms, and thenceforth—not sparing their labour—to labour only as combatants. To the Russians new fire was imparted by the example of some freshly acceding troops which—panting to show their true quality after having been under a cloud—fought on and on and on with a zeal and a courage that won the hearts of their comrades.

CHAP.
II

The fierce, bloody, hand-to-hand strife was from time to time interrupted when—receding perhaps a few feet—the masses in conflict sometimes left open spaces between them great enough for exchanges of fire; and then of course for a while their cartridges blazed through the darkness, but again and again the closer fighting recurred, and again and again was maintained by French and Russians alike with a valour that seemed nearly equal. Preceded as we have seen by four conflicts, and no less a number of captures alternately changing the ownership of the hotly contested prize, this the fifth of the fights for the counter-approach was, it seems, the most stubborn of all, and already the night was far gone, when the French at last made good their mastery, over-threw all the Russians before them, and once more recaptured the Work.<sup>(1)</sup> and its recapture by the French.

VI.

When this combat had ended, the night was already far spent, and the French soon perceived that they had not time left for the process—

Course afterwards taken by the French.

CHAP. impossible without cover from darkness—of securing themselves in their prize against the guns of the fortress. Therefore, after first doing their best to ruin or damage its trench-work, they withdrew from the counter-approach thus long and fiercely contested, but not without a firm purpose on the part of their chiefs to attack it again the next night.

Signals
from the Volokoff
tower;

On the 23d, the Russians learnt from deserters that the Allies had received great reinforcements, and their watch-tower (the Volokoff Battery) began to make signals. These signals announced that bodies of troops had been seen landing at Kamiash, but they also declared that on the previous evening and afterwards in the early morning that followed, other bodies—apparently from ten to fifteen thousand—had been seen to be there embarking.

Their effect on Prince Gortchakoff's determination;

This last announcement gave rise to various conjectures; and, amongst them, to one which suggested that the Allies might intend to effect a landing on some part of the coast, with a mind to operate thence against the Russian field army. Prince Gortchakoff, on this ground, considering that he ought to concentrate troops on the 'Old City Heights,' and in the neighbourhood of the Mackenzie Farm, reckoned also that, if doing so, he would not be able to replace any further heavy losses which the garrison might sustain by drawing troops from his field army. He therefore resolved to abandon this difficult struggle — already so costly to life — for the Cimetière counter-approach.* To make sure before yielding, however, that the French remained firm in their purpose, he left two battalions in the Work with orders to fall back when gravely attacked, and he directed that the troops thus withdrawing should not be supported by others.†

On the night of the 23d, the French renewed their attack on the Cimetière counter-approach; and, though meeting, it seems, more resistance than Prince Gortchakoff had consented to sanction, they very soon made good their conquest. Then reversing the parapet, and making the other fit changes, they so well transformed the work that what had been a counter-approach stretching out like a shield to cover the heart of Sebastopol was, before morning dawned, a new parallel confronting the Fortress, and established moreover on heights so near and commanding that siege-guns there planted might shatter some all-precious links in the enemy's chain of defence.

The conquest was thus complete, but it cost the French dear. Altogether, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, they lost 2303,‡ and the Russians 3061.§

* This decision of course gives support to those of the Allies, including the French Emperor and Niel, who desired a resort to field operations.

† These directions were made an 'order of the day.'

‡ Niel, pp. 255, 357.

§ Todleben, vol. ii. pp. 248, 249.

CHAP.
II

his decision

Night of the 23d;
the Cime-tière counter-approach carried by the French;

and transformed into a siege-work.

Losses on each side.

Ground on which the sacrifices made by Pélissier
were justified.

VIII.

The losses thus incurred by the French made a heavy addition to those they before had sustained when—with similar objects—assailing the obstinate Sousdal Counter-guard; and, it having been long since determined that the real attack on Sebastopol should be made through the Faubourg, an adverse critic might say that Pélissier was making his sacrifices in the wrong part of the field. Pélissier, however, was one who accepted the teachings of science, and authoritative science assured him that, whatever might be his design for ultimately attacking the fortress, he perforce must uphold the ascendant of a firm, unrelenting besieger, and uphold it along his whole front by all the fighting required for securing the end thus enjoined. Still, observers with minds not high-strung, and not sufficiently braced by the cogent precepts of Vauban might well feel pain in reflecting that all these distressing sacrifices offered up on the west of the Chersonese could be only indirectly conducive to what had become the real object—the object of reducing Sebastopol by first reducing the Malakoff.<sup>(2)</sup>

CHAPTER III.

PÉLISSIER FIRMLY PURSUING HIS CHOSEN PLANS OF ATTACK IN DEFIANCE OF LOUIS NAPOLEON.

The fighting thus brought by the French to a CHAP. victorious issue was induced, as we saw, by the <sup>III.</sup> stress of the enemy's challenge, and could not have well been arrested by any orders from Paris;
but Pélissier had already made choice made choice, as he stated, 'irrevocably' of a well-defined plan of attack; and this, it was only too certain, his sovereign would forbid, or obstruct.

Impending strife between Louis
Napoleon and Pélis-
sier.

There followed sharp strife. On the one side, The Emperor contended an Emperor—an Emperor armed by new laws with authority to direct from afar the commander-in-chief of his army, and not only served by the magic of the electric wires, but also by a strong, zealous envoy established at the seat of war. On the other side, he who con- Pélissier, tended was only a general; but the general was Pélissier; and already we know the strength of his fiery, resolute nature.

Marshal Vaillant, the chief of the War Depart- Marshal Vaillant.

CHAP.
III. ment, placed 'absolute' confidence in Pélissier; but not being the Minister of a constitutional State, he could hardly exert his official power in any strong, peremptory way. He however did good, immense good. Marshal Vaillant had not passed in the world as a gentle, complaisant man; but he acted in this conjuncture with propriety and excellent sense, striving always to moderate, and turn away the wrath of the disputants, and entreating the angry general to soften his letters in form, yet not wishing, it would seem, that in substance Pélissier should yield to the Emperor.

Pélissier's
determination to renew the attack upon Kertch.

General Niel
at the Conference;

his written protest.

So early as the day when Pélissier announced his accession to the command at the English Headquarters, he freely declared himself minded to renew the attack upon Kertch; and this design was matured at a conference held the next day. General Niel being one of those present, stated fully the grounds upon which he thought fit to oppose the measure; but his counsel produced no effect.*

Strong, however, in his natural self-confidence, and besides in his conviction—his really well-founded conviction—that in this he represented the Emperor, Niel addressed to the French commander a deliberate remonstrance in writing not only against Pélissier's refusal to sanction any field operations for the purpose of investing Sebastopol, but also against his resolve to concur with Lord Raglan in sending a new expedition to

* Lord Raglan to Secretary of State, Secret, May 22, 1855.

Kertch; but Pélissier growing savage upon this provocation made haste to accentuate the language in which he conveyed his resolve, and by telegraph at once said what follows to the Minister of War: 'The march of two corps d'armée, one from Aloushta on Simferopol, the other from Baidar on Baktchi Serai, is big with difficulties and risks. It is the Kabyle country over again, and unknown. The direct investment effected by carrying the Mackenzie Heights would cost as dear as the assault of Sebastopol, and the result would be very uncertain. I have come to an understanding with Lord Raglan for the carrying of the counter-approaches, for the occupation of the ground on our right home down to the Tchernaya, and finally for an operation against Kertch. Our allies attach great importance to the measure, and I acknowledge that the operation is a good one. All is advancing: the movements are already in progress.'*

CHAP.
III

21st May.
Pélissier to Minister of War.

The next day, Pélissier addressed to Marshal 22d May.
Same to same. Vaillant a letter in which he requested that 'sufficient latitude' should be granted to him; but—read with the context—those words carried mockery rather than prayer; for an earlier part of the letter made it plain that the wilful general had already seized and used the broad freedom for which he professed to be asking. He already had written thus: 'Lord Raglan has asked me to renew the operation against Kertch, to which * Telegram of the 21st May.—Roussel, vol. ii. p. 191.

CHAP. III. ' the English army and Government and the two ' fleets attach so high a value. It has seemed to ' me that it would be good policy in reference to ' the future of our operations concerted with the ' English to make a beginning of my relations
 ' with them by an act which would heal the ' wound they received from the recall of the ' former expedition, would end the very grave
 ' trouble which it brought upon the relations ' between the French and the English, and re' store that harmony which is in one word the ' great necessity of the time. The expedition
 ' has therefore been determined upon, and the
 ' troops embark to-day.'*

Accentuated by such an announcement this language might well be astounding to the Emperor Louis Napoleon, since he not only found himself extruded from the command of his army in the Crimea, but even, as we saw, overruled in a matter concerning high policy, and the maintenance of friendship with England. He by telegraph said to Péliſſier on the following day:

Louis Napoleon to Péliſſier.

' I have confidence in you, and I do not pretend ' to command the army from hence.† Still, I ' must tell you my opinion, and you must respect
 ' it. It is absolutely necessary to make a great ' effort and beat the Russian army in order to ' invest the place. To be looking for space and * Telegram of the 21st May.—Rousseau, vol. ii. p. 191.

† This disclaimer was retracted by even the two next sentences, and again by the Emperor's two next messages to Péliſſier.

' for grass does not now suffice.* If you scatter CHAP.
 your forces instead of drawing them together, <sup>III.</sup>
 ' you will do nothing decisive, and besides, will ' lose precious time. The Allies have in the ' Crimea 180,000 men. With such a force any' thing can be done; but it is necessary to manœuvre, and not take the bull by the horns. To ' manoeuvre, is to threaten the weak sides of the ' enemy. It has seemed to me that the weak side ' of the Russians is their left wing. If you send
 ' 14,000 men to Kertch, you weaken yourself
 ' uselessly. It is confessing that there is nothing ' serious to be attempted; for one does not will' ingly weaken one's self on the eve of a battle.
 ' Weigh all that carefully.'†

The next day, Louis Napoleon wrote thus to Péliſſier:—'The course to take is easily indicated:
 ' 1st, to defeat the Russian army in order to ' invest the place; 2d, the place being invested,
 ' to take Sebastopol; 3d, the place being taken,
 ' to evacuate the Crimea, and blow up the fortifi' cations, or leave there only the Turks. The ' means of arriving at this result are of course
 ' more especially within your province, and I ' leave you free in your choice of the means; but,
 ' as for the general course of action, you must ' follow the precise orders that I give you. They
 ' moreover are orders similar to those which Lord
 ' Raglan has received. . . . I explain to

Louis
Napoleon
again to Péliſſier.

* This taunt was in allusion to Péliſſier's plan of taking ground to the Tcherpaya.

† Rousset, vol. II. pp. 192, 193.

CHAP. ' you, General, what are my views and my intentions. I reckon on your experience, your talents, and your patriotism to carry them into effect, and force Lord Raglan to help you.'*

Pélassier to the Minister
of War.

The Emperor had hardly despatched this letter when he found laid before him this telegram of the previous day from Pélassier to the Minister of War: 'A strategic discussion by telegraph with all the reasons for and against such or such a plan seems to me impossible. The detailed reports that I send you by every mail will convince his Majesty, I hope, that if I have not applied his plan, this is because it does not seem to me possible to do so immediately without danger.'

Louis
Napoleon
to Pélassier.

Thereupon the enraged Emperor telegraphed to Pélassier: 'It is no question of discussion between us, but of orders to give, or to receive. I did not say to you, "Execute my plan;" I said, "Your plan does not seem to me adequate." It is an absolute necessity to invest the place without loss of time. Tell me what means you will employ to attain the object.'†

Pélassier to the Minister
of War.

Though Pélassier was himself, as we have seen, a fiercely choleric man, he yet seemingly knew how to meet the angry raging of others with a manful composure. In answer to the Emperor's missive, but addressing himself, as usual, to the Minister of War, Pélassier fenced lightly enough with the imperial notions by reverting to the arguments he had used in his famous letter to Canrobert,* and added, 'My first duty was to restore that understanding [with the English] which had been greatly compromised. I have completely restored it. I can't specify future operations without exposing myself to the risk of having my words falsified by the course of events. Be trustful. Let his Majesty also deign to be the same.'†

* Rousset, vol. ii. pp. 211, 212.

† Ibid., p. 212.

CHAP.
III.

When the Emperor thus found himself baffled in all his persistent attempts to direct a campaign from the Tuilleries, it was natural of course that his emissary should fall from the height he had reached in the palmy days of the 'Mission.' General Niel soon began to write piteously of the treatment he was receiving from the fiery commander-in-chief: 'At a meeting which took place yesterday he, Péliſſier, ordered me to be silent with a harshness not to be characterised, because I spoke of the dangers attendant upon vigorous actions attempted by great masses at great distances. We were in presence of English officers. I saw his anger, and determined at all costs to avoid a scene which would have made my relations with him impossible. Thus morning at a similar meeting General Beuret of the Artillery, for making a perfectly innocent observation was so grossly ill-treated that his eyes filled with tears, and he asked me whether he could remain with the army. . . . Here is now a man who and lamentations of General

Niel.

* See ante, vol. viii, p. 285.

† Rousset, vol. ii. p. 213.

CHAP.
III.

'is going to become a raging madman.' . . .
'The English have drawn him, Pélissier, to them,
'and he has adopted their system of war—a sys'tem, in my opinion, the most imprudent of all,
'—which consists in pushing straight forward
'from the old positions.'

After expressing the grief inflicted upon him by the change of plan, and showing that Pélissier was angry with him for writing letters to the Emperor, General Niel continued:—

'The army in the Crimea is excellent, and asks
'but to fight. What is wanting to the army is a 'chief to lead it. God grant that the army may 'have one!' †

Niel's ex-tire loss of power.

Under the vigorous sway of Pélissier, Niel retained not so much as a shred of the baneful power he had wielded in General Canrobert's time.

Niel had aided his sovereign in doing grievous harm to the French and their allies by paralysing their action against Sebastopol; but it must not be imagined that he was only a servile man striving for mere obedience' sake to execute the will of his sovereign. On the contrary, his ceaseless insistence on the policy of completely investing Sebastopol by means of field operations was the natural and direct result of his own strongly rooted opinion.

To thoughtful men rendered anxious (as was, we know, Marshal Vaillant) by the antagonism of opinion established between the Emperor and Pélissier, any hope that this gulf-wide difference might be treated as a 'misunderstanding' removable by patience and words could hardly have failed to prove welcome; but no such outlet lay open. Each, Emperor and General alike, asserted his strongly fixed will with so great a precision that the antagonism between the two men became, and remained, clear as day. Upon all the five questions that had to be solved, their two judgments,—I might say, their 'decisions' (for each of them thought to be master),—were, not simply differing, but opposite. Pélissier determined—determined, as he said, 'irrevocably'—that by stress of close siege operations he would carry the south of Sebastopol. He determined that, till after achieving his purpose against the 'South side' of Sebastopol, he would order no field operations with a view of investing the place.<sup>(1)</sup> He determined that, without more delay than was needed for due preparation, he would attack and reconquer every one of the counter-approaches to which Canrobert had submitted. He determined that, with troops not required for the toils of the siege, he would occupy ground extending to the left bank of the Tchernaya. He determined that, along with the English, he would renew the Expedition to Kertch. To every one of these measures the Emperor opposed his authority. One or other—the Emperor or the General—would have to give way, or else to be forcibly vanquished.

* 'Fou furieux.'

† Roussel, vol. ii. pp. 209, 210.

Antagonism between Louis
Napoleon and Pélis-
sier.

Pélissier's
five resolves;

Louis
Napoleon opposed to each of them.

CHAP.
III.

But which?

Pélissier's
Resistance.

There are signs, though not proofs, that the need of arresting wild, hazardous efforts to direct a campaign from the Tuilleries was felt to be painfully cogent by more than one man in authority; but, whether he acted in circumstances implying something like concert, or was singly obeying the call of a duty he owed to his country, or whether again he was ruled by the sheer force of judgment, or in part by temper or temperament, Pélissier at all events guarded France, and the honour of her army, from the meddling hand of a sovereign who, not being either a trained, or by natural gifts a born soldier or even a soldier at all, and not acting under the guidance of any responsible Ministers, still supposed himself fitted—by wisdom—to conduct from Paris a war carried on under novel conditions against the empire of Russia; and how, when driven to words, Pélissier used them as means which helped towards averting the mischief we have partly been able to see; but it was not by words alone that he kept the perturber at bay. He often used 'golden' silence, and from time to time answered with deeds more convincing than all worded arguments.

Occupation
by the Allies of fresh ground towards the Tchernaya.

With before him his Emperor's message decrying any resolve to take ground towards the Tchernaya, Pélissier promptly made bold to set the measure on foot; and—concurrently with troops of all arms supplied by the other allies—he carried it into effect. It was on the 25th of May, at the close of a march begun before midnight, that, supported by not only English and Ottoman forces but also by the newly acceding Sardinians (whose appearance and bearing seemed excellent), two French divisions under Canrobert (the late commander-in-chief) moved down to the Tractir Bridge, and—after sweeping the enemy from the opposite bank of the Tchernaya—took up a position which, starting from the base of the steep at the right rear of the Inkerman battle-field, extended thence down to the river.

CHAP.
III.

And again, when Péliſſier saw that imperious words from the Tuileries were condemning the movement to Kertch, he none the less ordered or suffered the denounced expedition to sail, and held on in its prosperous course.

On all the five warlike resolves he had made <sup>Péliſſier</sup> in the teeth of his Emperor, this stronger, more <sup>having his</sup> way. hot-headed man was destined to have his way.

Péliſſier had a great, mighty will; but he seemingly gathered new strength, as strong-willed men oftentimes do, from what some would call 'the 'dark passions'—from anger, from hatred, from scorn.

In writing to the Minister of War, Péliſſier did not even deny himself the luxury of a little sharp satire directed against the Emperor. He contrasted the strategical dreamer in Paris, his 'general maps' and his 'geometric lines,' with the real commander engaged at close quarters against the real enemy and on the real ground. Whilst persevering in absolute, explicit resistance to the Emperor upon every question then raised,

CHAP. he coolly said that he would separate himself from
III. the Emperor's views as little as possible, and besides, wrote almost as one who belonged to a constitutional State, saying that he hoped to justify the confidence reposed in him by—not the Emperor but—the Minister to whom he was writing.* Towards the end of one letter he wrote:—
 ‘ I feel my shoulders strong enough for the bur‘ then with which I am laden, but I shall carry
 ‘ it all the better if feeling that I have a certain ‘ freedom of action.’

*Allusion to the Directory of 1796-97
and the great Buonaparte.*

By the stroke of Fate thus oddly busied with its last impish freak of inversion, a metamorphosed ‘Napoleon’ was all at once left in the plight of that unhonoured Directory of 1796 and the following year, which thought it could dictate in war, or dictate at the least in State policy to the great Buonaparte, and was answered from over the Alps with resistance, with scorn, and with victory.(?)

* Roussel, vol. ii. p. 218.

CHAPTER IV.

THE RENEWED EXPEDITION TO KERTCH, WITH ITS SEQUEL
IN THE SEA OF AZOF, AND ON THE CIRCASSIAN COAST.

I.

IN even its stage of preparations, the second armada despatched to open the Cimmerian Bos- phorus, had already by fortunate accident achieved a great good, and apparently saved many lives. That which—signalled from the Volokoff Watch-tower on the 23d of May—put a stress on the enemy's counsels, and brought him, however reluctant, to accept defeat from the French, was a movement of vessels and troops going on in the port of Kamiesh for some purpose he could not divine. The activity he then thought mysterious was the stir of embarkation importing a renewed expedition to Kertch.

Much of what I premised when recounting the abortive Expedition begun on the 3d of May must be now borne in mind, or recalled by those who would have clear ideas of the subsequent in-

Relevance of some previous statements to the subject of this second Expedition.

CHAP. <sup>IV.</sup> vasion pushed home through the Kertchine Peninsula to the shores of the Sea of Azof.*

In the interval between the two expeditions, the Russians had mounted some guns on the Cheska Spit, and had also continued their efforts to block the way through the Straits by sinking vessels charged with explosives; whilst also it is true on the other hand that (designing them for garrison purposes) the Allies brought with them, this time, a body of 5000 Ottoman troops, and varied by other less changes the original structure of their armada as prepared for the first expedition; but in other respects, speaking generally, the conditions attending this second advance, and any attempt to oppose it resembled those we saw operating nearly three weeks before, when—not having been yet overtaken by Canrobert's words of recall—the armada had sighted Cape Takli, and was smoothly approaching the coast.

The renewed expedition embarked in the evening of the 22d and the morning of the 23d of May. The attendant fleets English and French were commanded, the one, by Admiral Lyons, the other, by Admiral Bruat.

composition of the armada.

Commanded by Sir George Brown, the land forces of the Allies were, this time, 7000 French under the immediate command of General d'Aute-marre, 3000 English, and 5000 Turks under Red-chid Pasha (in all 15,000), having with them five * See especially ante, vol. vii pp. 257-262.

PLATE 3.

Google

Digitized by srujanika@gmail.com

batteries, a few Engineers, and (for escort duty) a body of some fifty English hussars.

CHAP.
IV.

Soon after daylight on the 24th of May, the armada gained its place of rendezvous off Cape Takli, and then at once moved on at speed towards the bay of Kamish Boroune, in which the troops were to land.

The strength of Baron Wrangel was still, as before, a little short of 9000, and included nearly 3000 cavalry.

The strength of Baron Wrangel.

Judging roughly of the numbers against him, Baron Wrangel considered himself placed in exactly the same predicament that had threatened him on the approach of the First Expedition.

The predicament in which he was placed.

As before, so also, this time, and still for the same cogent reason, he judged that he could not defend that precious chain of coast batteries which had given him his control of the Straits. He succumbed to the power (of which the world will learn much in times yet to come)—the power an armada can wield when not only carrying on board a force designed for land-service, but enabled to move—to move swiftly—whether this way or that, at the will of the chief, who thus, so to speak, can ‘manoeuvre’ against an army on shore with troops not yet quitting their ships. The power would be one of great cogency, under many conditions, but especially so if it happen that the defender of the coast has in charge two highly valued possessions divided the one from the other by several miles of ground.

The power to which he succumbed.

Of those two tracts of ground far disjoined from each other which Baron Wrangel, if able, would have anxiously sought to defend, the one towards the east comprised the Coast batteries fraught with the absolute control of the Straits, and its retention he might well deem momentous, since only to that very end was he there with horse, foot, and artillery; but then he could not forget that the command of free access to the Isthmus and the roadway along its whole course was something more than 'momentous' to him and his forces—was in truth rather what men call 'vital,' because involving his all-precious communications with the main army under Prince Gortchakoff to which he belonged, and the Government of the country he served.

In common land-warfare, a distance of some seventy miles between two tracts of ground that have to be guarded may not be a circumstance hampering to plans for defending them both; but it grievously baffled resistance to squadrons with troops on board, and propelled by steam-power at a rate vastly greater than any that battalions of Foot can attain by marching and countermarching along the weary miles of a road. To mistake a feint for the opening of a real attack might be to incur a disaster; yet how to distinguish between the two operations by merely watching ships out at sea? The Allies made no feint; but by simply advancing straight forward to what, as we know, was their object, they did not prevent Baron Wrangel from thinking that the movement was or might be a feint; and, although resting simply on inference, his belief was no whit less distracting than a feint really made. The sight of an armada approaching the landing-place of Kamish Boroune did not even for an instant make Wrangel believe himself safe against a descent on the shore some seventy miles to the westward, because he well knew that a signal run up in a minute by one of the flag-ships might, like magic, arrest and reverse the whole eastward movement, and swiftly send back the armada to waters off the known landing-ground in the neighbourhood of the town, Theodosia, where its presence would all at once challenge his command of the Isthmus, and with it, the very existence of all the force under his orders.

CHAP.
IV.

It was under these painful conditions—conditions deserving the study of any maritime Power which has coasts at home to defend, or coasts abroad to attack—that Baron Wrangel abandoned his defence of the Coast batteries, determined to have them destroyed, and drew off to Sultanoffka at first, but afterwards towards the great Road—the Imperial Road through the Isthmus which connected him with the main Russian army.

Baron
Wrangel's
retreat.

Accordingly it was without opposition, though not of course without guarding against any chance of attack, that (under the cover of guns disposed on board the steam frigates and other less vessels) the Allied troops with horses and batteries and all their train of appurtenances began to fill the boats of the squadrons, and move towards the landing-

Unopposed landing of the troops.

CHAP. place chosen in the bay of Kamish Boronne.
IV. Under the immediate direction of Admiral Houston Stewart (whose arrangements were held to be perfect) the process continued all day and throughout the following night without being delayed or obstructed by any kind of mishap. The French and the English infantry were the first to land, and Brown placed them in position, the French on the right, the English on their left, and provided that, when disembarked, his Turks should take the ground he assigned them in support to the other allies. Soon afterwards, General d'Autemarre at the request of Sir George moved forward towards the Coast batteries established near the Cape of St Paul.

Baron Wrangel's destruction of his Coast batteries.

Exactly as he had intended to do when the first expedition was threatening, Baron Wrangel soon began to destroy his Coast batteries by blowing up their magazines and spiking their guns. Beginning with those near Cape Paul, the Baron went on—at intervals—with this work of destruction, and by his orders sooner or later, though not with precipitate haste, and not in every case with such promptitude as to prevent the discharge of some shots, his Coast batteries were, all of them, ruined.

Retreat of Russian troops

Followed by the gunners of the Paul batteries then already destroyed, that part of Baron Wrangel's land-force which he called 'the Detachment of Kertch' retreated in a westward direction by the great Theodosia Road. These, however, with most of his troops in the east of the Kertchine Peninsula were soon gathered round CHAP.

IV.
Sultanoffka (where headquarters at first were established), but his ultimate current of retreat was towards the all-precious Isthmus. The small garrison of Yeni Kalé was left to escape by sea.

Whilst making free havoc of his master's batteries, the Baron likewise sought to destroy all such other Government property as he could not remove, and besides, every sort of possession thought likely to serve an invader. He destroyed more than four million pounds of corn and half a million pounds of flour.* Destruction of food by Baron
Wrangel.

With the singular keenness these people seemed almost always to show when destroying the possessions of their own fellow-subjects, some Cossacks alertly spread out over part of the steppe, and hastened to burn down the farmsteads.

With respect to the Russian war squadron assembled in the bay of Kertch, Baron Wrangel, The aqua-troon of
Kertch. it seems, did not order Rear-Admiral Wulff, who commanded it, to undertake any defence of either the town or the Straits, nor even to oppose any craft whether English or French trying singly to push through the Straits; but he desired that, before making off, the vessels composing this squadron should take on board Government property; and from this cause it happened that they were not all moved out from the bay at an earlier time.

* More exactly, 4,168,000 lb. of corn and 508,000 lb. of flour. The figures are taken from entries made in the Russian Government books.

CHAP.
IV.M'Killop's
exploit.

One of these small vessels of war, that is, the steam-schooner Argonaut, had at length got her cargo on board, and was already making off for Yeni Kalé, when Lieutenant M'Killop (commanding a gunboat, the Snake, not employed in the landing of troops) conceived the idea of trying to stop her flight. Dashing past some guns not yet destroyed, he first opened fire on the fugitive Argonaut, and then also on the war-steamer Goëts, which the Russian Admiral Wulff had sent out to aid her, and then also on a third war-steamer, the Berdiansk, which by that time had come out from the bay with all the archives and chests of the local administration on board. The commander of the Berdiansk did all he could to quicken her speed; but M'Killop by the exceeding skill and rapidity of his movement out-maneuvred the fugitive, and—firing with shell—undertook to bar the passage against her. Two of her men were wounded by explosions effected on board her, and her commander convinced himself that she could not make good her escape. He therefore ran her on shore, and burnt her with all her cargo on board. The other two vessels (the Argonaut and the Goëts) which M'Killop had engaged, were also, it seems, prevented by his skilful manœuvres from making good their escape, and the enemy with his own hands destroyed them.<sup>(1)</sup> The Snake was struck by a shot which passed through the vessel, but she did not lose a man. Altogether, as may well be supposed, M'Killop's exploit was enchanting to the numbers of eager seamen collected on board the two fleets.

Rear-Admiral Wulff, the same day, burnt down other vessels belonging to his unhappy squadron, and went on with the work of destruction till out of the fourteen vessels which had composed it there remained, it seems, only four. The four vessels preserved were all of them, however, war-steamers, and comparatively powerful.

With these, at 7 o'clock in the evening, Rear-Admiral Wulff moved out through the Straits, and got off into the Sea of Azof; but the escape, if so one may call it, brought, after all, only a respite soon followed by utter destruction.*

The Allied navies toiled all night long at the work of landing not only men, but horses, guns, stores of all kinds, and had hardly completed their task, when at 4 o'clock on the morning of the 25th, Captain Lyons of the Miranda despatched Mr George Williams, the master of the ship, with orders to endeavour to find and buoy a channel through the Straits. This service the skilled, fearless officer achieved in the ship's gig and cutter under fire from the Russian battery still left on the Cheska Spit, 'and between exploding and burning vessels which had been sunk in the fairway and set on fire by the enemy.' By the channel thus found, Mr George Williams passed through the Straits, and was the first officer of the Allied forces to enter the Sea

Chap.
IV.

The Allied navies;
their operations.

Channel into the Azof found and buoyed

* See post, p. 63, and pp. 65, 66.

CHAP.
IV.Miranda reaching the entrance of the Sea of Azof.

of Azof. At 10 o'clock the same morning Mr Williams returned to the Miranda, and reported to his Captain that he had found and buoyed a channel of 16 feet. Captain Lyons immediately weighed, accompanied by the other vessels under his orders, and with these before long reached the goal of long expectation—the entrance of the Sea of Azof.

Advance of the land forces through Kertch.

At 6 o'clock in the morning of the same auspicious day, Sir George Brown pushed forward the land forces, and marched upon Kertch, a remarkably clean well-built town of about 12,000 inhabitants. In 'ordinary column of route' the Allied forces marched through the place, maintaining a great regularity and committing not the slightest disorder. Sir George felt it his duty to destroy an iron foundry which had cast guns and shot for the Czar; but no other harm was done at that time in the town.

It was many days later that under a strong sense of duty and with great reluctance Sir George Brown destroyed a great quantity of corn provided for the enemy's troops.

to Yeni Kale.The General and the Admirals meeting.

The Allied troops continued their march, and by one o'clock reached Yeni Kalé. There, established at the mouth of the Straits, Sir George was soon joyfully greeted by the Allied Admirals.

Disorders
that followed the invasion.

This otherwise well-omened enterprise against the Kertchine Peninsula was unhappily marked by a stain which, though hardly discerned at the time by the more Western nations of Europe, must not be here screened from the light. The CHAP.

IV.
invasion gave rise to disorder, and disorder was _____ followed by crime.

For this the Allies, as I think, became justly open to censure, and the subject, though painful, is one that must not be shunned.

We cannot excuse the Allies by alleging that stir of the blood which comes with the clash of arms; for, whether in the process of landing, or in taking their rest on the shore, or in afterwards pursuing their march, the invaders from the first to the last encountered no sort of resistance; nor again can our country at once deliver herself from the charge by saying (as with truth she could say) that few, very few of our people were guilty of disorderly acts, and none of violent outrage; for he who commanded the troops of the three invading nations was an Englishman, and accordingly England stands challenged to answer the question which asks how the conquerors wielded their power.

In fairness towards the memory of Sir George Brown, it must always be borne in mind that of the 15,000 men he commanded 3000 only were English, the rest consisting of French to the number of 7000, and of 5000 Turks; that except by making representations to General d'Autemarre he could not interfere with the discipline of the French troops; that, when busied in mischief, the soldiery of our excited Allies could be hardly restrained by their officers; and finally, that the traditions and instincts of the Frenchmen; the authority of Sir George

The limited
Brown.

CHAP.
IV. Turks, and the English collected under Sir George were far from being the same, or even indeed at all similar on the theory of licence in war.

Kertch. Upon seeing the approach of the armada, the people of Kertch had been frightened, and the bulk of them fled from the place, taking refuge in the neighbouring villages.*

Its prayer to Sir
George. When Sir George Brown marched through the town on the morning of the 25th, he was met by a deputation of the principal inhabitants then left in the place, including the consuls for Austria and Naples. They declared to Sir George that the Russians had all of them fled from the town without leaving there any authority that could shield its deserted inhabitants from foes they described as 'the Tartars'—men intending to come down upon them from the near countryside; and they implored Sir George Brown to leave some troops in the place for the protection of their lives and property.(†) This Sir George refused flatly to do, protesting that he was not Governor of the country; and for any other protection than such as might be rendered appropriate by the conduct of his troops, he told them they had no claim upon him. Recommending the deputation to form a municipal council which might administer the police of the town, he continued his advance on Yeni Kalé.†

His rejec- tion of their entreaties.

In the course of the march 'our allies,' as Sir

* Todleben, vol. ii. p. 283.

† Sir George Brown at Yeni Kalé to Lord Raglan, 27th and 28th May.

George Brown distinguished them, spread out C H A P.
IV. over the country for miles, and busied themselves with the 'sport' of shooting pigs, sheep, fowls, ducks, and—supremely amusing!—tame geese. Such indulgence on the part of invaders might perhaps be called trivial, but it weakened the bonds of discipline. After occupying Yeni Kalé, our allies, Sir George says, 'broke away 'in their old style';* and, most of the inhabitants having fled, forced open the houses, and not only gutted the town, but set it on fire in two places. Unhappily, some of our soldiers—not any, however, of those who were under the eyes of their officers—permitted themselves for a while to follow the example in part, and prove guilty of conduct pronounced to be far, 'very far 'from blameless';† but though erring on that first afternoon, when the instinct of 'sport' was awakened, they did not again go astray.‡

The next morning Sir George Brown concurred with General d'Autemarre in appointing a French officer to act as commandant of Yeni Kalé for police purposes, with support from an English provost-marshall and assistants, and having at his disposal three companies of infantry, two French and one English.

Commanding the means thus provided, the their result French, says Sir George, showed great zeal in repressing the sins of the Turks; but for the

* From one 'Peninsular officer' to another this phrase expressed a good deal.

† By Sir George Brown, 27th and 28th May.      ‡ Ibid.

Disorders
on the march;

and in Yeni Kalé.

Cessation of all misconduct of the English troops.

Measures taken by Sir George
for the maintenance of discipline;

CHAP. task of restraining their own men, the French officers seemed wholly powerless. It was 'pitiable,' wrote Sir George, 'to see their faces' when asked to undertake such a duty.* The Turks were not undeserving of the keen efforts made to restrain them. They, day after day, proved guilty of committing horrible outrages.†

The Tartars
in Kertch destroying and plandering.

The menters taken by Brown and by the people of Kertch.

On the same day, the 26th, a second deputation from Kertch came before Sir George Brown at Yeni Kalé, informing him that the dread expectation of the day before had become a reality, that the town was in a state of anarchy, and that 'the 'Tartars,' as they called them, were plundering and destroying everything. In the face of this appeal, Sir George again refused to give the place any garrison; but a vessel of war at his instance was promptly moved into the bay. The unfortunate people of Kertch found means to arm for their protection a body of fifty men of various nationalities; and this small improvised force proved firm and courageous in dealing with isolated outrages committed by stragglers, as for instance when they promptly shot down several Turks whilst resisting attempts to arrest them for knocking out the brains of a child;‡ but—weak in numbers—these guards did not seemingly try—and so far as I know, were not ordered—to drive out the plundering Tartars.

* Sir George Brown, 27th and 28th May.

† Sir George Brown to Lord Raglan, 29th May.

‡ Ibid. They, it seems, killed one, and seriously wounded the rest.

When the Kertch deputation had left his headquarters, Sir George was informed that some boats'-crews, both English and French, had been getting into the town, and doing there even more mischief than the people called 'Tartars.' He therefore determined to send — on the morrow — an infantry regiment accompanied by twenty Hussars to the Quarantine Station near Kertch, with orders to send detachments patrolling into the town, and, if possible, to restore order by giving countenance and support to such provisional authority as might be established.*

CHAP.
IV.

On the same day, however, Sir George received a letter from Captain Loaring, commanding the Furious—the vessel sent into the bay—which stated that the uproar in the town was worse than ever, and called for immediate assistance.

Sir George thereupon sent off a body of twenty Hussars with orders to go to Kertch, and there 'see what was the matter'; but he had conceived the idea that the attack by the so-called 'Tartars' was almost 'a revolt of the Tartar population' with which he ought not to meddle, and this so much the more since he thought that the aggressors—described to be 'Tartars'—were—not enemies to the Allies but—their friends, who indeed more than once had captured and brought in Russian prisoners from even great distances; and he determined not to interfere 'further than 'to protect the weak from outrage.' †

* Sir George Brown to Lord Raglan, 27th and 28th May.

† Ibid.

CHAP.
IV.

The exception, it seems, applied only to the case of an outrage attempted in sight of the Hussars when patrolling; for in any larger sense 'to protect the weak from outrage' was substantially of course the same thing as maintaining peace in the town, and that last course of action was one which Sir George had resolved not to take. 'I distinctly said,' he informed the inhabitants, 'that they must take care of themselves, and were not to look to me for protection. . . . I decline to furnish any guards.'*

Failure of the measures taken.

Sir George Brown's expedient of patrolling into the town twice a-day from the precincts of the Quarantine Station must have brought fitful intervals of relief to the fear-stricken people of Kertch, who at each of the times for patrolling, and whilst in sight of the horsemen, might believe themselves safe for at least a few minutes, or perhaps half an hour, but the measure did nothing towards either expelling the Tartars or putting an end to their outrages. All that seemed to be needed for restoring order was the voice of authority, and authority resting on force—for the 79th was at hand—Sir George Brown amply possessed; but for reasons we have heard him disclosing he resolved not to use the spell.

Continued
disorders
in Kertch.

Most of the houses deserted by Russian occupiers—and these formed the main part of the town—were plundered and gutted;† as were also indeed, we are told, nearly all of the other buildings.* From some houses the roofs were torn off, and their timbers used for firing. The hospitals even were pillaged.†

* To Lord Raglan, 10th June.

† Sir George to Lord Raglan, 4th June.

CHAP.
IV.

Sir George Brown had at one time agreed with General d'Autemarre to place a guard over the Museum in Kertch; but he afterwards abandoned the project, because convinced that, if small, the guard might not be secure; and that one of sufficing strength could hardly be spared for the purpose.‡ The Museum thus left to its fate was gutted, was plundered; and, unless General Todleben erred, or for once wrote in irony, the plundering of the institution was perpetrated by hunters after 'antiquities'—men who also, he says, pushed their search down to even the tombs of the dead.§

By whom were these outrages perpetrated? The committee of outrages. They were perpetrated, it would seem, in the main by the native marauders called 'Tartars'; but in part by 'boats'-crews' from both fleets, and in part too by straggling soldiers—some French and some Turkish—who, despite the commands of their officers, had found their way into the town.

The commander of the expedition proved happily able to say that amongst all the 'stragglers' engaged in these crimes and outrages not one English soldier, as far as he knew, had been seen.||

* Todleben, vol. ii. p. 284.

+ Ibid.

† Sir George Brown to Lord Raglan, 10th June.

‡ Todleben, vol. ii. p. 284.

|| Sir George Brown to Lord Raglan, 10th June.

CHAR.
IV.

Forthereontinuance of the disorders in Kertch.

Lord Rag-
lan's indignation.

His approval on 31st May of Brown's measures.

His completed enthusiasm averted.

Sir George
not blamable for omitting to repress the disorders of
the French;

So late as the second week of June, when Sir George Brown at length was preparing to quit the invaded peninsula, he still could not say that in Kertch the reign of disorder had ceased. People there, he indeed plainly wrote—so late as the 10th of June—were ‘in terror of their lives for the Tartars.’*

Lord Raglan heard with warm indignation of the earlier disorders afflicting a part of the conquered territory; but when he had read the two first of Brown’s letters on this painful subject, he thought well of the orders Sir George appeared to have given, pronouncing them to be ‘very good’; and accordingly he cherished a hope that they ‘would prevent all further excesses’;† but the hope, we know, was not fulfilled; and a criticism rendered complete by basing it on the later as well as the earlier letters was averted by the stress of events.

For not having repressed the disorders of the French troops, Sir George Brown, in common justice, could hardly have been treated as answerable by even the strictest of judges; for, although he indeed on this subject could freely make representations to our Allies, his authority as the chief in command did not otherwise include any power to meddle at all with the discipline of General d’Autemarre’s troops;‡ and the expedient of remonstrating against their offences with either General d'Autemarre himself or any other French officer was a tender matter, and dangerous, whilst also in general likely to prove, as we have seen, wholly barren. Sir George did not of course deserve blame for omitting to use a power with which he was not really armed.

* To Lord Raglan. If not strictly orthodox English, Brown’s use of the ‘for’ is good Scotch.

† Lord Raglan to Sir George, 31st May.

‡ Instructions of 2d May, incorporated by reference with those of the 21st.

The Quarantine Station of Kertch was not only well separated from the rest of the town, but so spacious as to be capable of holding some 5000 men; and Brown's plan of posting in it a foot regiment with a score of Hussars was good so far as it went; but in mercy to the unfortunate inhabitants, no less than for the advantage of the invaders, it ought to have been rendered effective by establishing authority in the town, and promptly restoring order.

It is true that Sir George's idea of regarding the violent Tartars as people in arms against Russia was not without a semblance of warranty; for the coming of War—beloved War—to their long-conquered, Czar-ridden steppe had roused in these men grand emotions deriving from the blood of their ancestors; so that —touching, pathetic recurrence to forefathers great in the saddle!—a band of them, all poorly armed, yet mounted, every one of them, on ponies, if not bigger horses, came riding over the steppe, came enlisting themselves, they imagined, for war to the knife against Russia, with before them the rapturous prospect of recovering their old independence. They were men in a dream,

CHAP.
IV.

because virtually unable to do so.

Comment on Sir George's course of action with respect to the disorders in Kertch.

Friendly deposition of some of the Tartars

CHAP. but their dream was coherent, and not altogether
IV. unshared by the English commander. As already they had given an earnest of their simple, rude 'foreign policy' by bringing in Russians as prisoners to the camp of the invader, so now—in arms, and on horseback—they offered him a warlike alliance with the once mighty Golden Horde.

Sir George apparently thought they might prove to be in some sort the Spaniards, or even the tried Portuguese of his early and glorious days; but ought he to have purchased the friendship of even the Golden Horde at so heavy, so painful a cost as that of allowing a town within easy reach of his camp to lie seething day after day, and even week after week, in the agonies of a slow doubtful strife with bands of men—not perhaps murderous, but—intent on destruction and pillage?

The enemy's forces had vanished without attempting resistance; and, there being therefore no prospect of fights on the Kertchine Peninsula, it is hard to see how an alliance with its Tartar inhabitants could be of more worth to the invader than peaceful, friendly relations with a well-ordered seaport town (lying midway between his headquarters and his works near Fort Paul) which was yearning to receive at his hands the blessings of protection and government. If only for the sake of withdrawing irresistible temptations to crime from the reach of the Allied forces, there was seemingly reason enough for repressing disorder in Kertch; for the town, as we know, was within a short walk from the camps, within a pleasant row from the ships, and could not but prove attractive to many young soldiers and sailors when known to be in the throes of a conflict involving such tumult as would offer them adventures and licence.

From the pillaging of the hospitals at Kertch, from the flight of the Russian inhabitants, and finally from the state of anarchy which long afflicted the town, it resulted that the sick and wounded Russians who had been brought thither from Sebastopol were exposed to the sufferings caused by not only want of appliances, but also want of due care.*

It was in favour of those hospital patients that, when about to retreat, Baron Wrangel had addressed an appeal to the commander of the invading force, recommending them to his kindness and humanity;† but of course, when taking that step, the Baron had assumed that the Allied troops would be in the occupation of Kertch, and in point of fact, as we have learnt, no such occupation took place. It was therefore antecedently probable that the letter would find no recipient, and I am led on other grounds to believe that it never in fact reached Sir George.†

* Instructions of 2d May, incorporated by reference with those of the 21st. † Ibid.

† There is no mention of it in the correspondence; and Sir George was so full a writer that the absence of any such mention is scarce short of actual proof that the letter was never received.

Sufferings entailed on the sick and wounded Russians by the pillaging of the hospitals.

Letter on their behalf from Baron Wrangel.

CHAP.
IV. Whether brought to its destination or not, the letter remained unanswered.

It would be miserable to have to believe that any English commander proved deaf to such an appeal; and this all the more since we know that the Russians were habitually treating our prisoners of war in their hospitals with careful and generous kindness.*

When, as shown in an earlier page, the General and the Admirals met at the entrance of the Azof, they already had achieved no small part of their appointed task.

First results of the Kertch expedition.

The first gains that accrued to the Allies from their newly acquired dominion in the Kertchine Peninsula were:—

1. The capture of all the enemy's Coast batteries in the neighbourhood of the Straits, and of the 62 guns which had armed them—guns throwing a weight of metal which reached in one salvo to 2376 pounds.†

2. The capture of guns not in battery, amounting with the 62 above mentioned to upwards of one hundred, many of them of the largest calibre and of the best construction.‡

3. The ruin of the squadron of Kertch—ruin prompt as regarded the fate reserved for ten of * Lord Raglan to Secretary of State, 19th May 1855, a published despatch, p. 167 in Sayer's Collection.

† Todleben, vol. ii. p. 289.

‡ Sir George Brown to Lord Raglan, 27th May, correcting his former despatch.

its vessels, and, as to the four still afloat, ruin CHAP.
only staved off a few hours. The squadron thus brought to destruction by the hands of its own people carried guns of which three were 68-pounders, but the shot it threw in one salvo had only a weight of 1026 pounds.*

4. The acquisition by the Allies of several enemy's merchant-vessels, and of vast quantities of corn which the captors either appropriated or destroyed, and of 17,000 tons of coal secured for the use of their squadrons.

5. The destruction by the enemy himself of a vast amount of property belonging to the Russian Government, and conducive to its service in war.

6. But the great advantage of all was of course The main object gained.
the one sought from the first by those who had planned the expedition — the opening of the Straits of Kertch, and the free way thus won to the Sea of Azof with all the consequential results of which we are going to hear.

These advantages were, all of them, gained without the loss of a man.

II.

A few hours only had passed after the opening of the Straits, when a joint flotilla of French and English steam-vessels with the two Admirals on board moved out into what till that day had been the 'closed' Sea of Azof, and so, as it

The Allied Admirals entering the Sea of Azof.

* Todeben, vol. ii. p. 267.

CHAP.
IV.

were, took possession of the waters then all at once added to the dominion of the Maritime Powers.

Captain Lyons of the Miranda then taking the command of the united flotilla.

On the same afternoon, the flags of the Admirals were hauled down, and the command of the flotilla then passed to Captain Lyons of the Miranda, the son of our Naval Chief, for he was the senior officer; but the immediate command of the vessels which composed the French part of the flotilla belonged to M. Sédaiges, an excellent chief of whom the senior (Lyons) wrote always in terms of warm praise.

Nature of the operations undertaken in the Sea of Azof.

The operations that followed must not of course be regarded as so many acts of proud war undertaken in pursuit of a conquest, but rather as measures required for enforcing those new rights of ownership which the passage of the Straits had conferred. The task of Captain Lyons in the Sea of Azof and the tangible part of its shores was analogous to that of a colonel or major-general who, having been appointed the governor of a lately conquered province, must bring it under subjection to the newly acceding authority.

Still, it seems fit on public grounds to show how a sea newly opened in what till the day before had been the interior of Russia was taken in hand by the squadrons.

Fate of the four surviving warships of the Kertch squadron.

The shoal at the mouths of the Don forbade hope of flight for all vessels with more than a small draught of water; and the sight of hostile flags in this sea—so lately a sure sea of refuge—

S

THE SEA OF A NEIGHBOURIN

Snale

sufficed to make the enemy's Admiral run ashore, and burn down his four surviving war-steamers —surviving as we saw, out of that which, until dispersed by McKillop, had been 'The squadron of 'Kertch.'

CHAP.
IV.

After this hastened act of despondency the Russians had no vessel left with which to watch, much less oppose the advance of their naval invader. Young Lyons found himself master—the undisturbed unchallenged master—of what a few hours before had been a fast closed Russian lake surrounded on all sides by Russian provinces, and affording them a natural outlet, a privileged highway of their own.

Unchal-leaged mastery of the Allies in the hitherto
'closed' sea.

Long accustomed to have it imagined that they could not be assailed with impunity in the trunk of their empire, Russians bitterly felt the sharp thrust which a new irresistible power was now—with strange ease—driving home. How deep the thrust went, people easily saw when observing that the eastermost of the provinces coerced by the Maritime Powers, and unable thenceforth to send out so much as a sail or a boat from the mouths of its own famous river, was the one that furnished to Russia her Kozaks, or 'Cossacks of 'the Don'—men deemed so transcendently Russian that—although, as I think, without justice—the figurative diction of many (including the great Napoleon) has made the name of their race an equivalent for Russia herself. By the French more especially, who had heard what their mothers could tell them of 'The Cossacks' the

Access thus obtained to the interior provinces of Russia;

as, e.g., to the country of the Don Cossacks.

CHAP. 'Cossacks! the Cossacks!' there well might be
 IV. felt strange emotions when—along with a now friendly England—outstretching the long naval arm, and touching the westermost nests of that once notorious horde which, however disregarded as combatants, had as plunderers startled the France of an earlier and horrible time. Those were men who, not quitting their saddles, would trot up the stairs of the palace or the house they were going to despoil, and ride straight into a drawing-room on horses well used like themselves to the piteous screaming of women.<sup>(3)</sup>

The seat of industry that Lyons disturbed.

What Lyons disturbed on the Sea and the shores of the Azof was a vast seat of industry, but industry plainly devoted to the business of war. The shipping engaged, it is true, was but lately the shipping of commerce bearing corn to foreign ports; but it had been brought into the service of the Czar for commissariat purposes, and was busied in transporting supplies for the use of Prince Gortchakoff's army. To this end alone were corn-stores lining the beach, and unarmed vessels plying in hundreds. It was the right and the duty of Lyons to destroy, if he could, the foundations of all this hostile activity.

His task not one leading to battle.

The Allies having no troops on board, and the enemy having no war-ships, there could not of course well take place any great engagement between them; and no one reading what follows must hearken at all for a battle, but rather think of the task committed to some naval officer who is ordered to tear out the nest of inveterate contrabandistas, and seize their forfeited goods.

With regard to those unarmed vessels busied in the transport of food that could be caught by war-steamers at sea, the task of course was an easy one; but Lyons and M. Sédaiges, and the officers and crews of both the united squadrons, agreed to make it easier still. At the sacrifice of their pecuniary interests, they agreed to forego their clear right of bringing the craft before prize courts, and to substitute destruction for capture.

It was only when applied to those vessels which had fled towards the land for shelter, or else to the ranges of corn-stacks and other Government property disposed on some parts of the shore, that the task of destruction left room for the skill and the daring of seamen.

From an anchorage it found off the lighthouse on the Spit of Berdiansk the united flotilla commanded the harbour as well as the beach; and—covered by the fire it delivered—the boats of both the squadrons effected a landing under Commander Sherard Osborn. The men who had landed destroyed the vessels in port, and afterwards other craft found at a distance of nearly four miles. They also burnt a Government store.

Several steamers detached from the squadron were meanwhile chasing such vessels as could be descried out at sea.

When off the beach of Berdiansk, Captain Lyons there found run on shore, and burnt down to the water's edge, those four Russian steamers of war

His task against vessels found at sea.

and those that had fled towards land.

20th May.
Operation off the Spit of Berdiansk.

The wrecks of the four war-steamers that had escaped

CHAP.
IV.from Kertch.27th May.
Off the town of Berdiansk.

which had escaped—for a while—from Kertch with their leader Rear-Admiral Wulff. It is dismal, after all, to be seeing the very, very end, and last obsequies of even an enemy's squadron. The unhappy Rear-Admiral's flag was still flying from the wreck of the Moloditz.

From a position commanding the town and also the beach some small-armed men and marines from both of the squadrons were landed under Commander Lambert, and they destroyed many vessels as well as some Government corn-stores. Steamers also meanwhile intercepted the craft that were seeking to escape by flying for the mouths of the Don.

28th May.
Lyons engaging the port of Arabat.

From a position off Arabat, Captain Lyons engaged the fort and blew up a caisson of ammunition. The vessels caught outside the Straits were all destroyed.

Plan of summoning the authorities.The rejections they elicited.

In so far as they could without derogating from the performance of their duty, Captain Lyons and M. Sédaiges were intent on the avoidance of measures that might harm the peaceful inhabitants in either person or property; and, before undertaking to execute the works of destruction ordained at Genitchi, at Taganrog, at Marionpol, and at Gheisk, they summoned the authorities in each place to surrender the vessels and the Government property which they meant to destroy; but in every instance (except that of Gheisk) they were met by what, judged from its words, was a thoroughly decisive refusal, and driven therefore to execute the forcible measures required for enabling them to compass their CHAP.

object. IV.

Judged, I have said, from its language; but, These compared with the acts of the authorities professing defiance. none must therefore imagine that the acts of these men in authority corresponded with their words of defiance. Because valiantly sounding those words were perhaps for the moment delightful to the ear of the much-deceived Czar, but we shall see that they were not followed up by the manful resistance they promised. Of all the three local commanders who successively hurled defiance one certainly attempted resistance, but only of the most feeble kind, which did not cause a loss to the Allies of so much as even one life; and the other two, when danger came, simply marched off their troops, without fighting, to distant places of safety.

Genitchi was a town on the straits called after Operations of Genitchi 29th May. its name which connect the Sea of Azof with the inner waters of the Sivache. Apprehending that, if the Allies should prove able to enter those waters, they might operate against his communications by the north of the Crimea, Prince Gortchakoff but a few days before had not only reinforced the garrison of Genitchi, but had also sent into the place a new governor, Colonel Prince Lobanoff-Bostoffsky, with instructions to organise the defence of the Straits. When the new governor found himself summoned to abstain from all defence of the vessels and Government property at Genitchi, he rejected the demand in high-spirited language, which, supposing it about

CHAP.
IV. to be followed by corresponding action, was right and becoming; but the sequel of his warlike response seems beyond measure strange. Though he did not recall the defiance, Prince Lobanoff-Rostoffsky *not choosing to expose his troops to useless losses, withdrew them to a distance of five versts from the town:** thus leaving the unarmed inhabitants to face the dangers created by him who had rejected the summons, and to see a chief follow up his proud words of defiance by marching off the whole garrison to a place of safety!

It may well have been fitting to refuse the demanded surrender, or—under a contrary view—to withdraw the troops without fighting; but how the man could—with honour—adopt both the courses of action, and leave unarmed people to suffer for all his vainglorious words, I have not been able to see.

By shelling a part of Genitchi, the squadrons opened a way through the Straits for the boats sent in under Mackenzie. The lieutenant and his men soon pushed through to the place of imagined safety which the fugitive vessels had reached, and set fire to them all (they were 73 in number) as well as to the great stores of corn there collected by the Russian Government.

The boats had returned to the ships, when men saw that other, though more distant, vessels were within reach, and that—turned by a change of wind—the fire was losing its hold on the range of the enemy's corn stores.

* Todeben, vol. ii. p. 289.

Thereupon Lyons resumed his fire on the place, and once more sent in the boats under Lieutenant Mackenzie, who destroyed the more distant vessels which had previously escaped destruction.

CHAP.
IV.

---

The service of landing on a part of the beach out of gunshot from the squadron, and, a second time, firing the corn-stores in the teeth of the Russians there seen to be gathered, seemed one of a desperate kind; and, supposing the enterprise to be attempted by a considerable body of men, it promised to involve a painful sacrifice of life; but three fearless officers—Lieutenant Buckley of the Miranda, Lieutenant Burgoyne of the Swallow, and Mr John Roberts, gunner of the Ardent, volunteered to achieve the object with their own unaided hands; and, Captain Lyons accepting their offer, they not only accomplished the task, but then happily made good their way back in spite of all the Cossacks endeavouring to cut them off from their boat. That day, 90 merchant vessels and corn-stores supposed to be worth £100,000 were destroyed.

Those shoals off the mouths of the Don which had forbidden all hope of escape for the enemy's squadron of Kertch, now seemed to be defending Taganrog and the adjacent shore from the enterprises of Captain Lyons and M. Sédaiges; for in even its 'Inner' roadstead, the flotilla of the Allies (as a whole) was kept far out at a distance of nearly 10 miles from the shore.*

1st to 3d
June.
Operations
at Taganrog and the mouths of the Don.

* At first only 8½, but increased to 10 miles by a change of

CHAP.
IV.

There existed, however, some channels lying open to the incursion of vessels with a very light draught, such, for instance, as the English Recruit or the French Mouette; and although, as might well be expected, the enemy had taken good care to remove the lights and the beacons, it was possible for the skill of the seamen to re-discover (by sounding) the veins of deeper—though still shallow—water that found their way through the shoal.

Taganrog, we know, was a place where the vast supplies brought down the Don lay stored on the beach; and the problem requiring solution asked how to effect the destruction of these warlike treasures whilst defended from naval aggression by a shoal ten miles broad, and by more than 3000 troops.

The resources for this purpose owned by Lyons and M. Sédaiges consisted only as yet of those vessels both few and small which, like the Recruit and Mouette, could make their way over the shoal. They brought with them, of course, their ships' companies, each including its share of marines, but had otherwise no troops on board.

In the night of the 1st of June, Lieutenant Day found a channel for his craft, the Recruit—a vessel that drew little water—and, the next morning, going on board her, Captain Lyons reconnoitred the town.

Since (with only the stated exceptions) the wind and a consequent fall of 3 feet in the depth of the water.

vessels composing the squadrons were—because of the shoal —lying off the town and port of Taganrog at a distance of nearly ten miles, the question was how, without them, to provide such a fire as would cover the landing of men. The seamen bent their minds to the problem; and Commander Cowper Coles of the Stromboli contrived a raft which would pass over the shoals with a gun of 42 cwt well planted in battery; whilst Lieutenant-Commander Horton of the Ardent imagined, and constructed with hammocks, what the men called 'a bed'—a bed so disposed on board the pinnace of his ship, that it furnished the needed support for a 32-pounder in action. Due experiment afterwards proved that the raft and the pinnace thus planned would, each of them, answer its purpose; and, with only those means of attack which have now been sufficiently indicated, the French and English captains agreed that their endeavours to burn down the stores which the Czar had collected at Taganrog should begin the next day, the 3d, at 3 o'clock in the morning.

But at sunset—despatched opportunely by Admiral Lyons—there hove in sight three river-steamers, light enough to move over the shoal, and carrying, each, one or more guns, with also twelve launches withdrawn from the line-of-battle ships. This welcome reinforcement supplied the exact means of action required for closing upon the enemy's stores in spite of the shoal which protected them.

CHAP.
IV.

From the way in which these welcome means were about to be used, it resulted that launches and other less boats would, this time, be expected to render the same kind of service as that which a fleet any day undertakes when, by pouring down fire on a beach, it covers a landing of troops. The measureless inferiority of any mere boats as compared with a man-of-war was to be compensated by the power they had of coming to much closer quarters with an enemy arrayed on the shore.

On the morning of the 3d of June (after duly concerting his measures with M. Sédaiges) Captain Lyons, on board the Recruit, advanced to an anchorage only 1400 yards from the mole-head, having with him the other light-draught vessels, both English and French, which were all of them towing their launches. On board one of the French light-draught vessels thus brought through the shoal to the front M. Sédaiges was present in person.

With the boats all collected astern of their vessels, Captain Lyons and M. Sédaiges awaited the Governor's answer to their summons.* The answer came after a while from General Krasnoff—an answer importing that he rejected the terms, and that having troops at his disposal, he meant to defend the place.(4)

Then down ran the flag of truce which, since the despatch of the summons, Captain Lyons had shown from the mast head of the little Recruit, and off moved the launches and boats which till then had been lying astern. Cowper Coles of the Stromboli commanded them, and in company with them, under the immediate orders of Captain Le Jeune, the French boats also moved forward. When all had reached the chosen position, the tow was cast off, and 'the boats' heads,' as Lyons expressed it, 'pulled round to the beach.' If borrowing land-service diction, one might say, I suppose, that from column the boats opened out into line. They began to deliver their fire against the enemy's troops, now seen to be on the alert, and desiring, if they could, to defend the vast range of the Government stores.

* What the terms of each summons were has been before shown. See note, p. 68.

The Russian troops or their leaders appeared to understand very well that, in order to defend the stores, they must come down towards the beach in the teeth of the fire from our boats; and, though feebly, they made several efforts to effect this advance. From time to time some of the bolder of them came down near to the Government stores, but never in numbers sufficient to make good their attempted defence; and accordingly it resulted that, from the first to the last, the enemy remained fended off from the strip of ground under dispute.

By thus fending off the Czar's troops, Captain Lyons and M. Sédaiges laid open a way for the second stage of their enterprise.

With a separate division of light boats carrying rockets and one gun on board, Lieutenant MacKenzie covered the approach of Lieutenant Cecil

CHAP.
IV.

CHAP. Buckley, who in a four-oared gig, accompanied by Mr Henry Cooper, boatswain, and manned by volunteers, repeatedly landed and fired the stores and Government buildings. By 3 o'clock in the afternoon, all the long ranges of stores of grain, planks and tar, and the vessels on the stocks, were in a blaze, as were also the Custom-house and other Government buildings.

The good seamanship manifested by the French
and the English

The destruction included a Russian war-schooner, with also a Russian guardship; but it was by the enemy's own hands that that last vessel perished.<sup>(6)</sup> So great was the skill exerted by the seamen both English and French, that though operating for three days amid shoals of vast extent, they did not from the first to the last encounter a single mishap.

From the feebleness of the Russian defence it resulted that the Allies were enabled to achieve their whole object without either inflicting any serious loss, or themselves losing even one life. They only lost one marine wounded; the Russians losing one soldier killed, and twelve more or less slightly wounded. The enemy's rejection of the summons had been proudly, defiantly worded; but the sacrifice it involved was left to fall much more severely on hapless non-combatants than on that newly reinforced body of from three to four thousand soldiers which had feebly resisted the landing, and had hardly, if at all, interfered with the steady work of destruction effected under their eyes.

Of the peaceful inhabitants eleven were killed, CHAP.
and forty-seven otherwise stricken.* IV.

The defence from its weakness afforded of course a poor sequel to those high toned words of rejection with which the summons was met, and seemed even to annul the whole warrant for a course of proceeding which subjected the peaceful inhabitants to losses of life and property. None could say that the victims were sacrificed to the exigencies of a valiant defence.

Marionpol was a place on the only highroad then left to the enemy for effecting his communications between the country of the Don and the Crimea ; and Colonel Kostrukoff, there commanding, affected to defy the summons brought him from Lyons and M. Sédaiges ; but the Allies quickly landed some men, and thereupon the whole garrison, consisting of some hundreds of Cossacks, was at once marched off without fighting to a place of safety. The town thenceforth remained for five hours in the hands of the Allies. The Allies took care to destroy the great stores of grain in the place, but did no harm to the town.(<sup>6</sup>)

6th June.
Operations
at Marion-pol.

At Gheisk, the authorities yielded to the exigency of the summons, and a vast quantity of hay and corn was destroyed.

Operations
at Gheisk,
6th June.

By a skilful manœuvre of his vessel, the Ardent,

* Todleben, vol. ii. p. 291.

CHAP.
IV

*2d June.
Operations
on the shore of Kiten Bay.*

in deep water found near the shore, Lieutenant Horton proved able to land from Kiten Bay Mr Roberts the gunner; and he with but two men to aid him destroyed sacks of flour collected for embarkation to the number of about 30,000.

It was not within the time limited by the bounds of this Narrative that Sherard Osborn and Hewett completed the work of destruction or obtained (as they did before long) the control of the Arabat Spit—that singular natural causeway thrown up between the two seas which, with scarce room for anything else, still carried the imperial post-road a distance of some eighty miles, and therefore seemed precious to Russia.

Losses of the Russians,

of the Allies;

Causes of their immunity.

From all these operations recounted in the Sea of Azof, there resulted a loss to the enemy's combative forces of a few score men killed or wounded, and to the Allies a loss of two men wounded.

This happy immunity from serious loss proved superbly the seaman-like qualities of young Lyons and M. Sédaiges and the officers and men acting under them sailors charged with duties which aimed at firm repression, not conquest, and at what was rather forcible government than flagrant war between equals. The immunity, we can see, was obtained by unfailing presence of mind, by a naval skill ever ready for each successive emergency, and withal by the well-applied daring of particular men. Thus, when Lieutenant Cecil

Buckley and John Roberts (gunner) at Genitchi, and Cecil Buckley again with Henry Cooper (boatswain) at Taganrog volunteered to undertake special services of a hazardous kind, they effectually compassed their objects, but they did something more. By dispensing with the aid of numbers, they plainly averted the evil of having to risk many lives.

CHAP.
IV.

The Allies put themselves to the pain of destroying these vast stores of food, because they had ventured to hope on what at the time seemed good grounds that the check which their measure imposed on the flow of supplies to the enemy would impair, if not bring to an end, his protracted defence of Sebastopol; but Russia, as was afterwards known, had already provisioned her army engaged under Gortchakoff for the whole of the then pending year, and was not therefore brought to extremities by losses which rather affected the great reserve magazines than any immediate wants.

The havoc, however, was great. In the first four days of the operations in the Sea of Azof, it already included the destruction of 246 vessels, a number soon augmented to one which our admiral pronounced to be 'nearly 500'; and on the 2d of June (a day long antecedent to the close of the destructive operations) he officially stated that the destructive operations conducted in the Sea of Azof had already overtaken a quantity of flour and corn which, if added to what was destroyed by the hands of the Russians themselves (as

*The object
of the burning*

This in great measure failed.

of the havoc.

C H A P.
IV. shown by their Custom-house books), would have furnished rations for four months to an army of 100,000 men.*

Many of the destroyed vessels Greek:

the bearing of this circumstance on the Czar's sense of dignity.

The moral stress put on Russia by taking the Sea of Azof.

Did the Czar's incapacity to defend his subjects tend at all to shake their old loyalty?

Of the vessels destroyed very many were Greek; and supposing, as I do, that the Czar was not without just, kingly pride, this bare fact must have touched to the quick his sense of honour and dignity. He had welcomed these gifted people, then warmly disposed towards his cause, making use of their toil and their property in what I have—not wrongly—called the interior of his empire, and yet there, even there, he had found himself unable to shield them from the power of his naval invaders

The merely physical losses sustained by the Czar were as nothing when put in comparison with the moral torture applied by carrying a naval invasion straight into the trunk of his empire.

If—fermenting in the midst of a people good, kindly, humane, and still (in the mass) truly loyal—an outburst of trueulent doctrine has of late seemed to hedge round the Czars with assassins instead of adorers, it does not of course at all follow that the origin of this hateful wickedness can safely be traced up to causes in force at the time of the war; but in spite of its Byzantine taint, what people call the 'Czar-worship' is not, after all, quite so slavish, so utterly abject a posture of trembling humanity as many believe when they hear of the grandiose prayers and thanksgivings which Moscow offers up to its idol. Much, in that respect, like other loyalty to other sovereigns, the 'worship' of the Czar rests in part on the floating idea that its votaries are accustomed to form of his power—his genuine power on earth, and, not least, his power to defend them from enemies with whom he has quarrelled.

* Admiral Lyons to Lord Raglan, 2d June 1855.

CHAP.
IV.

In so far as the creed was thus based, it lay open of course to a shock, when young Lyons (with Captain Sédaiges) began to touch the empire at home.

The Miranda had broken a spell. Till she passed through the Straits with her following on the 25th of May, the Azof had been a real province—a sea-clad province of Russia; and, for men on its shores to be witnessing the severance of such a possession from the Czar's inner territories, to be under a ban for the crime—the strangely new crime—of being his faithful subjects engaged in his actual service, to see how Russian commanders with infantry under their orders comported themselves in those hours when mass after mass of carefully harvested wealth was in course of being burnt to the ground because it belonged to their sovereign, but moreover to know that the Czar's lieutenants (including Prince Lobanoff-Rostoffsky) were men who could act in the way we were painfully forced to observe,—all this, if at first only startling, may perhaps have begun before long to disenchant some of the vot-

C H A P. <sup>IV.</sup> aries who long had been steady enough in the practice of humble Czar-worship.

It was natural that the change should be slow. Men might long go on dimly imagining that their old faith was sound; but, whether conscious or not of the change coming over their minds, they were plainly dragged far on the road which leads from darkness to light when forced to see, as they did from the shores of the Azof, that their Czar, if, as always, divine, was still for the moment at best an unsuccessful Divinity.

In proportion to its disturbing effect on the mind of the humble Don Cossack, or any other poor shoresman, the loss of the Sea of Azof was tormenting of course to his rulers, and all the more, since they knew that its severance from the Czar's dominions was so far definitive that perforce it would have to be borne, until the Invaders at last should choose to grant Russia a peace.

III.

Attack on Soudjak-Kale and Anapa re-

The forces, both naval and military, which had opened the Straits of Kertch lay assembled at no great distance from Soudjak-Kalé and Anapa, then held by Russia on the Circassian coast; and a prompt attack on these strongholds was eagerly counselled by Lyons.

Troops despatched for the purpose.

First, Lord Raglan, then General Péliſſier, adopted our admiral's project; and, to carry it into effect, a body of three thousand infantry—two-thirds of it French, one-third English—with a detachment of English artillery and fifteen 32-pounder battering guns was quickly despatched to Sir George Brown.

Divining apparently the purpose of the Allies, General Khoumatoff determined that, without awaiting the expected attack, Soudjak-Kalé should be abandoned, and accordingly on the 28th of May, after first destroying its batteries (which comprised sixty guns and six mortars), he withdrew all his troops from the place.

But Anapa at this time was still holding out; and upon the reduction of this latter and much greater fortress the desire of the Allies became concentrated.

All at once, under orders from Paris, the attack upon Anapa by either French ships or French troops was forbidden in terms the most peremptory that language could furnish.

It may well be supposed that attributing to himself all the powers of a thoroughly absolute sovereign, and sincerely convinced of his skill in the art of waging war from a distance, the French Emperor had suffered acutely on finding himself set aside in the way we have seen by the stern, unbending Pélissier; and — as though to recover his self-respect, and his sense of being really an Emperor—the bitterly mortified sovereign clutched hard at what seemed an occasion for asserting himself once more as a potentate that even strong men must obey. Having heard of the resolve to make an attack upon Anapa, he ventured to come down on

CHAP.
IV.

Pélissier's determined resistance to the prohibition.

Pélissier with an imperial message, commanding him on no pretext whatever to allow an expedition to Anapa.* Pélissier fiercely met the prohibition by determining that it should not be obeyed; but he varied his plan of resistance. He showed Lord Raglan the draft of a letter from himself to Admiral Bruat in which, after stating the purport of the Emperor's order, he directed the admiral 'notwithstanding to pass 'by Anapa on his return and to take part in 'the naval bombardment of the place.'†

The letter, Pélissier said, was afterwards modified, and perhaps he, still later, determined to refrain altogether from sending it; (‡) but at all events Admiral Bruat—unassailed by any real countermand—went on with the planned expedition.

Lord Rag-
lan's censure on the French Emperor.

Lord Raglan was angered by this new attempt of the Emperor to interrupt the business of war. 'I fear,' wrote the English commander, 'that 'much inconvenience may arise if his Imperial 'Majesty pursue the system of forbidding opera- 'tions that may have been determined upon.'‡

While thus running dead counter in action to Louis Napoleon's orders, Pélissier, it seems, was vouchsafing no other kind of reply to his sovereign's imperious mandate; (§) but fate meanwhile interposed with the magic touch of a fact. Persuaded that if left to face the approaching armada, its garrison would be simply annihilated, the enemy, under Khoumatoff's orders, withdrew on the 5th of June from the fortress of Anapa, and passed at once over the Kouban, thus abandoning with the last of his strongholds in that cherished part of the empire the whole Circassian coast.* He left in the place, as I count them, from our admiral's detailed report, 114 pieces of artillery.

* 2d June: 'Sous aucun prétexte ne permettez d'Expédition à Anapa.' Lord Raglan to Secretary of State, Secret, 12th June 1855.

† Ibid.

‡ Lord Raglan to Secretary of State, 12th June (No. 89).

Sir George Brown left the 5000 Turks supported by a thousand French troops, as well as by a thousand of English to guard the Straits of Kertch, and with the rest of his forces returned at once to the Chersonese.

CHAP.
IV.

Fall of Anapa.

The enemy's forced abandonment of the whole Circassian coast.

Troops left to guard the Straits

the rest brought back.

IV.

The fortunes of this brief campaign (lasting A contrast only about twenty days) were in contrast at more than one point with those of the main undertaking. In the course of their strife for Sebastopol the Allies had won glorious victories; but (after sustaining great losses) had as yet conquered nothing at all except the ground under their feet; whilst by this smoother Kertch expedition they had not tempted the enemy to face them in battle, and of course therefore had not been able to gain any victories, but still they achieved signal conquests.

The easy, untroubled invasion of the Kertchine

* Lord Raglan to Secretary of State, 12th June (No. 89).

C H A P.
IV.

---

General results of the Kertch
expedition.

Peninsula, the seizure of all the ground needed for the object in hand, the coercion that forced the enemy to destroy his whole chain of coast batteries, and burn down vessel by vessel, his war-squadron formed and assembled to guard these precious waters of Kertch, the opening of the famous straits of the Cimmerian Bosporus, the armed occupation of the Sea of Azof excluding all other flags, the hand of Authority laid on the shores of every province of Russia that bordered on what until then had been a 'closed' Russian lake, the enforced withdrawal of Russia from Soudjak-Kalé, from Anapa (the last of the strongholds she owned on the south of the Kouban), her immediate abandonment of the whole of the Circassian coast, the infliction besides on the Czar of such minor forfeitures as that of some 340 pieces of ordnance, of nearly 500 vessels engaged in his great commissariat tasks, and of supplies in enormous quantities all amassed for his army engaged on the Sebastopol theatre of war—these indeed, one may say, were results which, if purchased by battles and victories, might well have seemed more than sufficient to compensate serious losses; and yet the whole string of conquests scarce cost the Allies any sacrifice, did not cost them even one single life.

These not attained by surprise;

Nor can any man say that the conquerors attained their end by surprise; for since even so early a time as the spring of the previous year (1854), the Russians had been actively engaged in endeavouring to secure both their Straits and their Kertchine Peninsula from the much-apprehended attacks;* whilst, so far as concerned the advantage of being newly put on his guard, Baron Wrangel was specially blest; since but three weeks before, he had seen and studied the lineaments of the then approaching Armada not as yet overtaken at sea by Can- robert's words of recall.

CHAP.
IV.

Nor again can the main of what followed be fairly said to result from the faults or defaults of the Russian commanders. Baron Wrangel was plainly unable to defend the Kertchine Peninsula, and warranted therefore in yielding. Rear-Admiral Wulff on the whole could hardly perhaps do much better than destroy, as he did, his own squadron. General Khoumatoff, when abandoning the Circassian fortresses and the whole Circassian coast, acted under the painful stress of what—perhaps rightly—he judged to be hugely superior force; and, although it may be that, if led with a valour in action proportioned to the valour in words displayed by the officers summoned on the shores of the Sea of Azof, the troops under Prince Lobanoff-Rostoffskey, under General Krasnoff, and under Colonel Kostrukoff might have saved a good deal of their sovereign's property, and subjected the Allies to some loss, they, even so, could not have met the full stress of the naval invasion, or altered at all its main issue.

nor (in the main) by defaults of Russian commanders.

* Todleben, vol. ii. pp. 267 & seq.

CHAP.
IV.—

The pho-nomenon (so far) left unexplained

Granting this, there stands out a phenomenon unexplained by assigning 'surprise' or error of counsel—one inviting us to say why it was that Russia—a great Military Power—could be quietly stripped of possessions very dear to her—possessions by sea and by land, and this with such masterful ease, that from the first to the last she only wounded three of her assailants and did not kill even one.

The true
explanation

The simple truth is, that in regions where land and sea much intertwine, an Armada having on board it no more than a few thousand troops, but comprising a powerful fleet, and propelled by steam-power, can use its amphibious strength with a wondrously cogent effect; and—engaged as he was at the time in defending Sebastopol, the troubled Czar, after all, was not a potentate strong enough to withstand such an engine of war.

Lyons the organizer and eager advocate of the Expedition.

Carrying with him
Admiral Bruat and Lord Rag-
lan.

Pélissier.

The merit of perceiving this truth, and enforcing it with passionate eagerness, belonged to our Admiral Lyons, and—approved by Admiral Bruat—his measure received from Lord Raglan a warm, never-failing support; but, if we ask who in this business was the conqueror of the greatest obstacles, the palm must go to Pélissier. Concealing under his violence of speech and of manner the gifts that made him well able to shape and maintain a wise policy, he had plainly divined that, whether the English were right or whether wrong in their eagerness for the Kertch Expedition, they could hardly be brought back again into that state of confidence and good-humour which a cordial alliance demands, unless the recall sent by Canrobert at one o'clock in the morning of the 4th of May could be expiated, if so one may speak, by renewing without loss of time the joint expedition to Kertch.

CHAP.
IV.

Pélissier brought to bear on the object that will of his—always strong—which seemed in him to be steeled by the fierce heat of anger. He had need of his strength; for of late, as we know, the French Emperor had become more than ever an active, rampant opposer of all that the generals on the Chersonese believed to be their best means of effectively conducting the war.

his propalsion of the measure against the will of his Emperor.

With the letter of the law on his side, though not, of course, its true spirit (for he did not act like a king in full concert with the high State Authorities), this confident Louis Napoleon was still as before insistent on his actual, personal right to be playing the great game of war from St Cloud or from Paris; whilst Pélissier, believing it plain that surrender to such pretensions would inflict grievous harm upon France, and would even put in dire peril the honour of her arms, was brought perforce under the sway of principles higher and broader than those which in general serve to guide the conduct of officers. Resorting freely to action as a means of thwarting interference, and writing but little to Paris, he firmly maintained his own will against the will of his sovereign, and—without bringing on any rapture—proved able to set him aside.<sup>(6)</sup>

C H A P.
IV.

The severity of the contest which ended in this good result may well have been masked by Péliſſier's fierce, scornful way of alluding to any opposers like Niel and the Emperor; but in reality, the struggle was arduous, was full of danger, and must have cost the strong man anxious moments. This is why I have said that amongst the chiefs, naval and military, who firmly pressed to an issue this Kertch Expedition, Péliſſier was the one who conquered the gravest obstacle.

Effect of the success on the mind of Louis
Napoleon;

It was scarce possible that the thorough success of an expedition undertaken against the set will of Louis Napoleon should give him immense, unmixed joy. He, of course, had to say, as he did in six or seven cold words, he was glad the expedition had succeeded, but he hastened in the very same sentence to protest against every such measure.<sup>(10)</sup>

on the camps of the Allies;

The tidings of what had been achieved by the Kertch Expedition produced a great moral effect. They spread joy in the camp of the Allies, where Péliſſier and Lord Raglan commanded;* and proportionally afflicted and disheartened the forces defending Sebastopol.†

on the Russians.

Those who know where the Czardom is weak,

* Lord Raglan to Secretary of State: 'These gallant exploits of the Navy have spread joy in our camps.'—June 5, 1855.

† 'Impression défavorable.'—Todleben, vol. ii. p. 295.

and therefore know where it is tender, will say, I CHAP.
believe, that, if executed with like success some IV.
weeks before, when Lyons and Lord Raglan first urged it, this eastward invasion of Russia would have governed the issue of the Vienna negotiations and brought the war to an end.

The stress it put on their Czar.

CHAPTER V.

OPENING OF THE THIRD BOMBARDMENT.—VICTORIOUS ASSAULTS OF ALL THE COUNTER-APPROACHES BY FRENCH AND ENGLISH TROOPS,—CONCLUSION OF THE THIRD BOMBARDMENT.

I

CHAP.
V

Resolve of Pélissier
and Lord Raglan to, attack the counter-approaches.

THE French and the English commanders had been meanwhile resolving in concert to attack all those counter-approaches that guarded the Karabelnaya. These included not only the White Redoubts and the Kamtchatka Lunette, which had sprung, as it were, out of darkness to challenge and mock at the French in the months of February and March, but also the Work of the Quarries—directly opposed to the English—which had since been thrown up by the enemy in front of his Great Redan.

their concord

The concord at this time established between Pélissier and Lord Raglan was not the result of agreement attained by any mere compromise. Each chief thought exactly alike on the questions then ripe for decision, and having worked out his conclusion at a separate time, had also apparently reached it by a separate process of thought. CHAP.

With all its other priceless advantages, the con- V.
cord thus happily reigning between Pélissier The shield this afforded against Louis Napoleon's interference and Lord Raglan was plainly a shield of great strength that well might be used in resistance to any further dictation attempted against them from Paris; and, as though to prepare their agreement for service in that special way, the two chiefs reduced it to writing by a fitting exchange of letters.

Clinging fast to his much-beloved doctrine, The vain resistance
of Niel General Niel continued to urge that the investment of Sebastopol—in other words, a campaign fought out with success in the Open—should precede any action attempted against the counter-approaches; * but the power—the baneful power—he had wielded in Canrobert's time rested then on the authority of the Emperor, and the Emperor himself, as we know, had by this time proved wholly unable to obstruct the fiery Pélissier. ‘Knowing nothing of what is going on’—so Niel wrote to the Minister of War—‘I abstain from all reflection. I asked leave to offer some observations on the state of the siege, and was told that it was not the time.’†

Though the deputy of the far-distant monarch was thus almost fiercely repressed, the monarch himself might still try to assert his authority.

* Rousset, vol. ii. p. 215.

† Ibid., p. 216. Apparently sorry for his rudeness, Pélissier afterwards sent for Niel, and received him with marked kindness, but did not let him give counsel.

CHAP. V. Undeterred by the series of rebuffs and defeats to which we saw him exposed, the French Emperor ventured once more to try the flat 'letter of the law' against his resolute general. On the 5th of June, he allowed himself to assail Péliissier with this message, sent by telegraph:—'For the happiness of France, and for the glory of our arms, you are at the head of the finest army that perhaps has ever existed. An immortal reputation is assured to you, but you must do great things. Indeed the conduct of the siege is more a business within the sphere of the commander of the Engineers than of the Commander-in-Chief. Now, the general of Engineers has addressed to you these observations: "If you choose to continue the siege without investing the place, you will only obtain after bloody and desperate struggles, which will cost you the sacrifice of your best soldiers, that which would come to you of its own accord after the investment." In accord with the English Government, which is writing in the same sense to Lord Raglan, I give you the positive order to abstain from throwing your strength into the business of the siege before having invested the place.* So concert measures with Lord Raglan and Omar Pasha for taking the offensive and operating whether by the Tchernaya or against Simphéropol.'†

* "Je vous donne l'ordre positif de ne point vous acharner au siège avant d'avoir investi la place."—Roussel, vol. ii. p. 232.
+ Ibid.

Proceeding on the same day towards action of CHAP.
a kind strictly opposite to the course thus enjoined, Pélissier thus telegraphed to Paris:—' I am to see Lord Raglan to-day (with whom, by the way, I am in perfect accord), in order to make the final dispositions for the assault which is to put in our power the White Redoubts, the Green Mamelon, and the Quarry in front of the Great Redan.
According to my present reckoning, I shall commence this operation on the 7th, and I shall push it on unrelentingly with the utmost vigour.'* V.
Persistence of Pélissier.

The telegram from Pélissier was despatched, it would seem, at an hour when Louis Napoleon's peremptory orders of the same day had not reached the French camp; and their subsequent arrival elicited a few barren words in reply, but wrought no change at all in the purpose of this fierce, stubborn commander. His barren, evasive words ran:—' When I shall be able to do so in concert with our allies, I will execute your instructions of the 5th in so far as concerns action in the open field, which enters, as I have told you, into my own combinations. At this moment, cholera, pressing heavily on the Sardinian Army, makes it immovable. General Alexander la Marmora has succumbed to it.'†

* Rousset, vol. ii. p. 232.

† Translated from the copy in French handed by Pélissier to Lord Raglan on the 8th of June. The copy is headed:—' Copie de la réponse faite par le Général Pélissier à la Dépêche du Ministre de la Guerre, en date du 6 Juin ; ' but the letter of the 5th was from the Emperor personally.

CHAP.
V.

Then, sparing no further moments for hardy evasions like these, Péliſſier turned to the measures which he and Lord Raglan had planned.

The contemplated
attack.

By compassing that part of the project which aimed at the two White Redoubts and the Kamtchatka Lunette, our allies, after a long and mortifying interval of submission to hostile encroachments, would assert themselves at last as besiegers no longer repressed by the garrison; and one attractive feature in the plan was the proposed attack of 'the Quarries'; for in that field of action, though separated by an interposing ravine, the English, at no great distance, would be fighting on the left of the French.

IL

Resources and prepa-ratives of the garrison.

The Allies of course meant that the intended assaults should be preceded by a bombardment, and it therefore may be right to say that their siege batteries at this time counted 588 guns, whilst the guns of the Russians were in number 1174, of which 571 were of great calibre.

Resistance
to Todleben;

Besides the troops assigned to the coast batteries, the Russian garrison now comprised 57 battalions, 22 of which guarded the Faubourg; but dissension at this time was troubling the Russian defence, so that, contrary to the insistence and solemn warning of Todleben, the works destined to be attacked were left in an undermanned state. For the defence of the two White Redoubts the Selinghinsk and the Volhynia, as CHAP. well as of the five-gun Zabalkansky battery which had been constructed in their rear, there were V.

only assigned six weak battalions, and five of its conse-these during the daytime were kept in somewhat quence.
distant reserve (one in and near the Troitsky Ravine, and four in the Ouehakoff gorge), so that, to occupy the two White Redoubts, there remained only one battalion, 450 strong, which, accordingly, furnished them garrisons of no more than 225 men each. Ten battalions—one forming its garrison, the other nine held in reserve—were assigned for the defence of the Kamtchatka Lunette, and six for the defence of the Quarries.

From the 31st of May until a late hour on the 7th of June, General Jabrokritski commanded the troops in the Faubourg, and to him, in conjunction with General Timovieff (who had advised a like reduction), there specially fell the blame of leaving the defence of the works to insufficient forces; though of course the discredit of not repressing the pretensions of generals who presumed to be hampering the measures of the great engineer, would rest with the Commander-in-Chief—with General Michael Gortchakoff.

On the 7th of June, at an hour when assault was impending, Jabrokritski gave up the command, and was succeeded by General Khrouleff. Khrouleff thereupon gave orders for reinforcing the garrisons of all the counter-approaches with the utmost despatch, but he was baffled by the stress of events then almost immediately following, and it resulted that not only on the 6th, but also down to the evening of the 7th of June, the strength and disposition of the garrisons continued to be such as we have seen.

CHAP. V.

III.

Bombardment of the 6th of June.

In the afternoon of the 6th, at about three o'clock, the siege batteries of the Allies opened fire against most, if not all, of the works which defended the Karabel Faubourg. Well answered at first by the garrison, this third and most powerful of all the yet delivered bombardments was unrelentingly pressed until the day closed.

Pélissier
warmly greeted by the English
troops.

Significance of their cheers.

When Pélissier not long before night-time had left the Victoria Ridge, and was riding back towards his headquarters, he encountered a happy surprise. Our soldiery knew, although vaguely, that after acceding to the command of the French army, its new Chief refusing to shrink from even terrible sacrifices had peremptorily met the encroachments attempted from Western Sebastopol by hard, victorious fighting, that he had placed himself in full concert with the English commander, taking part in that Kertch expedition which had brought mighty joy to the camp, that he and the English Commander had already begun a new enterprise, that so early as even the morrow his troops and those of Lord Raglan would storm all the counter-approaches then left to affront the besiegers; and, if our soldiers divined that any French marplot was trying to resist, or to thwart the new Chief, their feeling towards him of course gathered all the more heart. Riding westward across Cathcart's Hill in the evening of that 6th of June, Pélissier found himself greeted by the roar of true English hurrahs that sprang from the Light Division, and was taken up camp after camp by all our troops on the Chersonese. Pélissier was deeply impressed. Tears came to the eyes of the seemingly hard, iron Chief; but—true commander—he looked to the firm, warlike purpose implied by this heart-stirring welcome. He seized it as an omen of victory.*

Although only with vertical fire (from the time when darkness set in) a bombardment went on through the night.

CHAP.
V.

Next morning, the 7th of June, the siege-guns reopening continued their work of destruction; and, whilst still, as before, expending the main of their strength on the Faubourg, they now too (by way of diversion) assailed the Flagstaff Bastion.

Bombardment of the 7th of June.

On even the first day, the 6th, the batteries of the Allies obtained a decisive ascendant; but from the morning of the following day, the 7th, they hour by hour asserted their more and more thorough mastery over all the antagonist batteries. The fire of the allied batteries was so destructive that even General Todleben was fain to stop the work of the bombardment.

* Letters from Headquarters, vol. II, p. 294.

CHAP.
V.

The fire of the English
guns.

Crippled
state of the enemy's works concerned in opposing
the French.

to break away in describing it from the colder language of science, and to treat the bombardment as an abnormal exertion of force—as violent, terrible, murderous. More terrific, it seems, than all else was the fire of the English.* They delivered their artillery blows somewhat slowly, one after another, but with a dreadful exactness, entailing havoc and ruin.<sup>(1)</sup> After three o'clock in the afternoon, the whole fire of the Allies—then no longer assailing the Flagstaff Bastion—was brought to bear on the Faubourg with appalling effect. By six o'clock in the evening, not only the two White Redoubts on Mount Inkerman with the battery called 'Zabalkansky' then newly thrown up in their rear, but also the Kamtchatka Lunette that crowned the Mamelon Height, and all the neighbouring works (including even the Malakoff) that might otherwise have given support to the foremost line of defence, were ruined or grievously crippled. Though not for the most part dismounted, the guns in the enemy's batteries were, so to speak, 'buried alive'—covered over with heaps upon heaps of what had been merlons, or traverses, or revetments of lined embrasures.†

In its bearing on all the assaults then about to be made by the French, the bombardment proved itself so effective that their onsets, however exposed to peril of other kinds, could hardly be defeated or checked by any artillery power.

Whilst thus smoothing, so far as was possible, the rough path of conquest, the English did more

The less injured state
of those op-

* Todleben, vol. ii. p. 810.      † Ibid., pp. 814, 815.

for the French than they found they could do for themselves. They of course poured the fire of their siege-guns on the work of 'the Quarries' — <sup>posting the English.</sup> the work they meant to assault — and they wrought a good deal of havoc on the nearest supporting work, that is, the Great Redan;* but they could not so cripple the numerous and powerful batteries in this part of the Karabelnaya as to prevent the enemy's gunners from disputing any hold they might take of the Work they were minded to seize.

All, however, agreed that the cannon had now done its work, and that what must come next <sup>The time for the bayonet come.</sup> was—the bayonet.

IV.

Pélissier and Lord Raglan determined to assault at almost the same time the whole of the counter-approaches which still in the Karabelnaya affronted the now strong besiegers. The attack on the part of the French was to be effected in strength by portions of the 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th Divisions of the 2d Corps commanded by Bosquet; on the part of the English, by detachments from the Light and Second Divisions, supported (at night) by the 62d Regiment, and entrusted to Colonel Shirley of the 88th, then acting as the general officer in command of the trenches. For counsel in matters best known to Engineer officers, Colonel Shirley had with him

* Todleben, vol. ii. p. 815.

100 CAPTURE OF THE TWO WHITE REDOUTS.

CHAP.
V. Colonel Tylden, the directing Engineer officer of the right attack. The English, as was their wont, hoped to do great things with small numbers; but by exerting the power he held as the officer in command of the trenches, Colonel Shirley could largely reinforce the troops first engaged, and a word from Lord Raglan (who would be present in person on the Woronzoff Ridge) might still further add to their strength.

Osman Pasha's division was placed in reserve near the head of the Careenage Ravine.

V.

At about half-past six in the evening of the 7th of June the welcome signal was given by a jet of rockets thrown up from the lofty Victoria Ridge; and it not only summoned to action French troops in that part of the field, but also those on Mount Inkerman, with which General Bosquet proposed to carry the two White Redoubts.

Attack and seizure of the two White Redoubts.

With the 4th Division (Dulac) as its reserve, the 3d Division (Mayran) moved forward in two columns; General Lavarande's brigade advancing on the Volhynia, that of Failly on the Selinghinsk Redoubt; and, although the assailants of the Volhynia Redoubt had to cross a breadth of some 330 yards, whilst those attacking the Selinghinsk were to traverse even double that space, both the forces pushed steadily on under fire without coming once to a halt before reaching each its set goal. To accomplish this advance—and it did not cost them any great sacrifice—was almost to ensure final victory; for thenceforth the weight of numbers—two whole French brigades to two bodies of but 225 men each—could scarce fail to govern the issue. The resistance of the two little garrisons might be hopeless, but still was brave. Chestakoff, the commander of the redoubts, and Bélaieff, commanding the battalion, were both of them killed. After a struggle in each of the works, which, although not greatly prolonged, was still hot so long as it lasted, the redoubts were both of them taken, the Volhynia by General Lavarande's, the Selinghinsk by Failly's brigade.

PLATE 5.

A second battalion of the Moroum regiment came up with a mind to support the vanquished and retreating garrisons; but yielding to weight of numbers, the men of this last force were soon in a state of discomfiture, and sharing in the fate of their comrades. Pursuing their vanquished enemy, the French pressed on over a distance of some 500 yards, and seized the Zabalkansky battery; but not choosing to hold as their own a work so far out in advance, they destroyed its embrasures, and spiked the five guns it contained.*

When about half an hour had passed, two other battalions of the Moroum regiment which had been in reserve all this while marched out of the Ouchakoff Ravine with a mind to retake the Redoubts; but long since, General Bosquet had seen that any movements of troops going on, whether

Seizure and abandonment of the Zabalkansky
battery.

The Russians throwing forward two battalions of their Moroum regiment.

* In that state Todleben found it, vol. ii. p. 330.

CHAP.
V.~~Movement
by Colonel d'Orion under Bosquet's
orders.~~~~His overthrow of the two Morgan battalions;~~~~400 Russians surrendering.~~

eastward or westward, between the Faubourg and the White Redoubts might give him a good opportunity of striking them in flank or in rear. Therefore under his orders Lieutenant-Colonel Larrouy d'Orion with two French battalions had moved down along the deep bed of the Careenage Ravine till he came to the viaduct, and had then clambered up the right bank of the gorge to a lair from which he might strike at the front, the flank, or the rear of any Russian troops moving to or from the Redoubts in either advance or retreat.

The two ill-fated Russian battalions had already passed over the viaduct, and were ascending the path up Mount Inkerman which led towards their goal, when all at once Colonel d'Orion with his agile French force sprang up the hillside in their rear, seemed intent to cut them off from Sebastopol, and threw them into confusion. They turned, and strove to get back the way they had come, and their movement to the rear was afterwards represented to Todleben as 'opening a way with the bayonet.' Of what fighting really took place we see indeed one painful trace—for the brave Colonel d'Orion received a mortal wound; but, so far as concerned nearly half, or more strictly four-tenths of the enemy's force, there resulted nothing short of surrender. Four hundred of the Russians, including twenty officers, were content to be taken prisoners by Colonel d'Orion's force.*

* Niel, p. 296. By Todleben (who wrote long afterwards) the statement is not called in question.

When the French, as we saw, had determined CHAP.
V.
French soldiers far out in front.
that the Zabalkansky battery was too distant to be of service to them, and had therefore done their best to destroy it, they were far from intending that their outposts should be kept back in rear of the work they had thus discarded as useless, and took good care, on the contrary, to spread their patrols over ground several hundreds of yards more advanced—ground by which they well knew that the enemy might approach them from the Karabelnaya; whilst also, as was natural, volunteer explorers and idlers moved rambling over the ground newly opened on that summer evening to the eyes of the victors.

The people thus scattered were, at one point, pressed back by Colonel Prince Ouroussoff with a single battalion;* at another by Colonel Kraievsky, despatched under Khrouleff's directions with no less than 800 men. In the course of the movement he made against troops thus receding before him, Prince Ouroussoff entered the site of the discarded battery (which the French had taken, spoilt, and abandoned three hours before), and on that simple action built up—built up, I believe, in good faith—a theory that he with his men had victoriously 'retaken' the work. Though he added that he had retaken it with our old friend 'the bayonet,' one is not therefore forced to infer that he meant to deceive human beings, but rather—Slave like—to put a kind of 'Hur-

Fruitless
advances of Russian
troops;

their reported achievements.

* General Timovieff (on what ground I know not) accompanied Ouroussoff's battalion, and was killed.

CHAP. V.
 —————— 'rah' in the midst of what reads like a statement. Prince Ouroussoff had even what seemed like a 'trophy' of the miniature sort; for the French in their chase had been using a baby-sized howitzer of the kind drawn by human strength; and when the pursuit had ceased, this 'perambulator,' as our nursemaids would call it, was left without 'hands' strong enough to withdraw it from the spot where it stood—the spot on which, it would seem, Prince Ouroussoff's soldiery found it.*

With plain signs of smiling incontinently at Ouroussoff's other mistakes, General Todleben nevertheless accepted the Prince's bold story; (‡) and was certainly led to represent that both Ouroussoff and Kraievsky had triumphantly engaged their small forces in not less than two brilliant combats. The theory drew much support from statements which showed that these Colonels had purchased their triumphs by enormous sacrifices of men; † but the French, it appears, never knew of their having sustained the reverses implied by such Russian victories, or at all events did not confess that they had encountered any such checks; and on the whole, my conclusion is that, although both Prince Ouroussoff and Kraievsky (the last under Khrouleff's orders) did really advance up the spur, and press back all the loose soldiery that came in their way, they encountered no formed battalion, and engaged in no serious fight, their losses being CHAP.

* See Rousset, vol. ii. p. 285.

† The Prince losing one-half of his force, and Kraievsky 187 out of 800. Todleben, pp. 322 and 327.

caused by the error of 'trespassing,' if so one V.
may speak, on what had become a French realm, without any due warlike motive. The deserts of the Prince and of Khrouleff (the ordainer of Kraievsky's advance) were not unlike those of an officer who has wasted good troops in the pastime of molesting an enemy's piquets.

Rejoicing in what he believed to have been his triumphant recapture of the Zabalkansky battery, and there, contentedly tarrying, whilst also perhaps somewhat flushed by his seizure of the small French 'perambulator,' Prince Ouroussoff harboured a fancy strong enough to make him feel sure that he then had 'no more worlds to conquer.' He not only fancied, but even—twice over—reported that the two White Redoubts—then observed to be doggedly silent—had passed back into the hands of his own fellow-countrymen, and he even brought General Khrouleff to accept the same pleasant belief; but under Todleben's orders the valiant sea-captain Skariatine* dispelled it in a very plain way by moving up with some men to the verge of the Selinghinsk Redoubt, and approaching the work so closely—that of course the darkness was favouring—as to be able to catch the voices of soldiers talking within it, and hear that they were talking in French.

Both this and the Volhynia Redoubt were secure in the hands of their conquerors; but the site of the Zabalkansky battery remained in the * Respecting Skariatine, see Note in the Appendix. (?)

CHAP.
V. hands of the Russians till a day or two afterwards, when, as the French had done before them, they spontaneously relinquished what Ouroussoff had thought to be a great prize.

It was after his capture of the Volhynia Redoubt, and indeed on the following day that—stricken unhappily by a merely chance shot—the brave General Lavarande fell.

VI.

First seizure of the Kamtchatka Lunette by the French.

Far away from the two White Redoubts, but still in a sense closely joined with them by relations of interdependence, that work audaciously planted on 'the Mamelon' with which the genius of Todleben had long been shielding his Malakoff was now at last brought under challenge. Not to take the Kamtchatka Lunette by even so mighty an effort as Pélissier was determined to make, would be a disheartening calamity; but to win it might be winning a stepping-stone to the paramount stronghold, and—after a while—to Sebastopol. Few, if any, believed that the Work could be seized and held fast without incurring grave losses.

*6.30 P.M.
The French troops harangued by Bosquet.*

At half-past five o'clock in the evening, General Bosquet, on ground near the Lancaster Battery, which he had chosen as his post of observation, assembled the Divisions of Camou and Brunet—the troops destined to attack the Lunette—and haranguing them regiment by regiment was answered by the cheers of the men.

In order to reach the last covert from which they would make their spring, they were first to advance some way down by the bed of the Dock-yard Ravine, next file up its right bank, and proceed to line the Third Parallel—the foremost entrenchment then stretching across the Victoria Ridge. There ensconced, they would have but to wait till unleashed by the promised signal, and then at once storm the Lunette.

After hearing General Bosquet's harangues the French troops advanced, and began to move down the Ravine in a state of most brisk effervescence, and a temper so eagerly warlike that to the eyes of a staid English critic their march seemed almost tumultuous.*

The more any regiment was agitated by perturbing emotions, the more its men seemed to contrast with the fair one who rode at their head in her panoply of fearless, calm pride.

To our people—descended of men who never had learnt to revere the beauteous goddess of Reason—this time-honoured scene of a drama in which the Vivandière acts was beyond measure strange; but to one who—first having been reared in the genuine French School of High Art—beholds her riding serenely at the head of her regiment in the moments preceding a fight she represents an Idea; and, it being divined, though but dimly, that this march against the Lunette would involve heavy slaughter, she now more than ever their advance in a state of warlike efferves-

The Vi-
vandière.

* Hamley, p. 239.

CHAP. seemed one who embodied the spirit of war. You might call her a priestess ordained, and bringing up human sacrifices to lay on the altar of glory; or again might see in her form a conventional image of France nobly leading her sons into action, and commanding them, if need be, to die. Each actress had her own 'reading' of the part that she played; so that one corps of troops for example was proudly led down through the gorge by a chieftainess riding in plumes; another by a bright girl attired with all the ineffable corneliness that belongs to the daughters of France when obeying strict laws of costume. The fairest of all was the one at the head of a much-favoured regiment, by our people called the 'Green Chasseurs.'* With infinite grace and composure she led her men down the Ravine to meet the fortune of war.

We have—not wrongly—lingered a moment to see the Vivandière pass; for—always characteristic, and linked with great warlike traditions—the memory of her presence, that day, gathered strength from the slaughter that followed. After an interval of perhaps hardly more than thirty or thirty-five minutes, the fight was destined to open, and then within one single hour, and within but a few hundred yards of the scenic display we have witnessed, the troops thus led down the Ravine would be falling, and falling by thousands.†

* Apparently the 'Tirailleurs.'

† As to the extent of the losses sustained by the French in that hour, see post, footnote, p. 113.

The chosen assailants of the Lunette had been not many minutes ensconced in the Third Parallel when at half-past seven o'clock the rocket-signal unleashed them, and with a vigour and evident intentness of purpose observed and admired by Lord Raglan they sprang at once out to the front.

To reach the Kamtchatka Lunette, General Wimpfen's brigade would have to traverse a space of some 500 yards; but the formation of the ground made it possible by choosing right paths to compass most of the distance without incurring strong fire.

The fast advancing brigade swept easily over the rifle-pits with which the great Engineer had striven to screen his Lunette, and pushed on in three columns. The one on the right was a regiment of Algerine Tirailleurs under Colonel Rose, the one in the centre was the 50th Line Regiment commanded by Colonel de Brancion, the one on the left was the 3d Zouave Regiment commanded by Colonel Polhès.

The Tirailleurs stormed and carried at once two of the collateral batteries on the (proper) left flank of the Lunette; and the other two columns advanced against the Lunette itself. When emerging from the shelter afforded by a dip in the ground, these troops gained the top of the steep leading up to the Work, they at once became fully exposed to grape-shot and musketry-fire, and at the same time began to learn something of the strength of the Lunette.

CHAP
V.

The Lunette attacked by the French

Their first capture of the Work;

CHAP. V.—The Ditch they had reached was one cut in the solid rock, was broad, was deep, with beyond it a bristling parapet. The French, however, undaunted by all the perils before them, descended the counterscarp, and some of them moved round by the Ditch to make their way into the Work by its gorge, whilst others by taking advantage of small breaches found in the parapet, and, in some cases, by standing up on the shoulders of their comrades, found means to enter the work by its embrasures. Colonel de Brancion was presently seen to be planting the colours of his regiment on the parapet of the assaulted Work.

Too soon, the brave colonel was struck dead; but, the sight of the victorious standard not failing to draw on the men still outside of the parapet, and the enemy's resistance collapsing under this bold attack, the Lunette was taken and occupied by the victorious French.

Their impetuous advance on the Malakoff;

Carried wildly away by their victory and the heat of pursuit, no small part of the French troops pushed valantly on up the glacis of the towering Malakoff, and some of them reaching the Work moved boldly down into its Ditch; but their effort not having formed part of the general design was left unsupported; and unable to climb their way back by the very steep counterscarp, these brave men became prisoners of war.

their retreat when attacked in

The spontaneous attack, as it chanced, took place at a moment when several fresh Russian battalions (held back until then in reserve) had newly entered the Work. These gathering together and led by General Khrouleff himself fell in strength on all those of the assailants who had not yet entered the Work, and drove them back into the gorge of the then newly captured Lunette. But this was not all; for those who were flying carried with them so great a disorder—augmented a few moments afterwards by the explosion of a 'fougassee'—that although, it seems, bravely attempted, no lastingly effectual stand could be made within the precincts of the Lunette, and after a brief, yet sharp struggle, the enemy still pressing forward drove all the French out of the Work they so lately had taken, and pressed them far in pursuit. These reverses brought with them a terrible slaughter of the French troops.*

CHAP.
V.

strength
by General Khrouleff.

Khrouleff's
recapture
of the Kamtschatka Lunette

Thus for once, although transient, there shone one bright gleam of success on a movement adventured by Khrouleff, and to him this was much; for, with all his ardour in war, he had not hitherto proved to be a fortunate general. He seems to have become highly excited. Believing perhaps that the French would patiently endure this recapture, he at once rode off to the east with a mind it would seem to complete his apparent victory by recovering the two White Redoubts.

But whatever Khrouleff might hope, General

* See footnote post, p. 118.

CHAP.
V.

---

General
Bosquet's measures.Second and definitive capture of the Lunette
by the French.The Mal-koff judged by Todleben to be in imminent danger.

Bosquet did not harbour a thought of submitting to this reverse. He proved equal to this new occasion. First ordering some batteries to play on the swiftly recaptured Lunette, he prepared to attack it with no less than two brigades of infantry, keeping also another brigade in occupation of the foremost parallel, or the trenches adjacent. For a while, the artillery raged; then all at once ceased, and the two brigades of Camou's Division advanced swiftly on the Lunette, surrounded it on all sides, attacked it with ardour, and rapidly carried the Work. This reconquest took place at half-past seven o'clock, and therefore at a convenient time, since the darkness before long approaching would enable the French engineers to fasten on the captured Lunette, and turn it against the garrison.

At this time Vice-Admiral Nachimoff and General Todleben were both in the midst of the ruins which cumbered, which almost had silenced the cardinal Fort of Sebastopol; and their counsels must needs have been anxious; for he who better than all men could judge such a question has said that the Malakoff for some time that evening was not only at the mercy of the French, but might even have been taken with ease.*

I have no separate statement before me of the losses sustained by the French in this part of the field, but we know that they must have been CHAP.

* Todleben, vol. ii. pp. 323, 324.

V. huge.*

VII.

The English attack was to open as soon as the French, towards their right, should carry the Work on the Mamelon. So, when from the Woronzoff Ridge Lord Raglan—warmly admiring—saw Bosquet's troops make their first onset, and seize the Kamtschatka Lunette, he at once let our people begin their intended assault of 'the 'Quarries.'

Since the night of the 19th of April, when Egerton captured the 'lodgment' confronting the left of 'Gordon's Attack,' and bequeathed his honoured name to the conquest thenceforth called 'Egerton's Pit,' the enemy had enlarged and connected the other neighbouring 'lodgments' which still remained in his hands, and from that beginning at last had completed a system of field-work which covered the Great Redan by an outer belt of defences some 400 yards in advance. These field-works, or 'counter-approaches,' as General Todleben called them, stretched across the whole Woronzoff Ridge in twofold lines of entrenchment; but the part of them destined to furnish the principal subject of strife was their main work thrown up on the

* Because those who fell elsewhere were certainly few; so that, to get at the number of those who fell in the strife connected with the enterprise against the Lunette no more than a small deduction can be made from the number—5543—which represents the French 'casualties.'

CHAP. V.—crest of a small rounded ledge which faced down towards Egerton's Pit. By our people this principal Work was always named after some hollows which scarred the ground in its rear; so that when a man spoke of 'the Quarries,' he did not in general mean the old excavations of stone, but the field-work which covered their front.

The enemy's measures of defence.

For the defence of this principal field-work, and the collateral entrenchments extending it across the Woronzoff Ridge, the enemy, at first, it would seem, assigned only six battalions; but from time to time, later on, as will be presently shown, he threw into the Work other bodies of chosen infantry, and on the whole one may say that, besides the original garrison, he engaged first and last in the conflict four distinct expeditions of infantry, with an aggregate of strength not disclosed, though clearly shown to be large. He laid in the ground where he judged that our soldiers might tread a number of boxes, charged each with 35 lb. of gunpowder. These were furnished with the needed appliances for making them explode under pressure; and—mainly because in mere structure they differed from the well-known 'fougasse'—men spoke of their use as a novelty malicious rather than warlike, and called them 'infernal machines.'

The attack was to be delivered by detachments from our Light and 2d Divisions, supported after a while by the 62d Regiment; and as 'General in the trenches,' Colonel Shirley commanded them. The duty of guiding our troops rested with the

Engineers, and specially with Colonel Tylden, CHAP.
their chief. V.

If occasion should offer, Colonel Shirley (as General in the trenches) was to act with alertness, with vigour on his extreme right, and to give the French troops all such aid as the strength of his own would allow.*

One great and exclusive advantage was destined to favour the enemy. The conditions were about to be such that (lest they might harm our own troops) the batteries of the English would presently have to abstain from delivering any fire on 'the Quarries'; yet the enemy otherwise circumstanced would remain free to use in the conflict his great artillery power; and this so extensively that, except only during brief intervals (whilst attempting to hold, or to retake the disputed Work with his infantry), he was destined to keep, and exert this terrible privilege throughout the approaching fight—a period of nearly ten hours.

Lord Raglan confiding in the quality of his troops, and anxious to avoid the losses that might be expected to follow from the use of gross numbers, determined to assault the main field-work with two separated bodies of only 200 men each, sending 300 more to attack the collateral entrenchments; but the troops thus thrown forward were to be supported by 600 more, and to be rapidly followed by very strong working-parties, some destined from almost the first (as was the

The great
and exclusive advantage about to be enjoyed by the enemy.

Lord Rag-
lan's dispositions for the attack.

* Journal Royal Engineers, vol. ii. pp. 269, 270.

CHAP.
V.—case, for instance, with the working-party of the 55th Regiment, 160 strong) to act as combatants, and besides, after nightfall to be aided by the 62d Regiment, as also, if the need should occur, by other troops within reach.

Colonel Robert Campbell of the 90th Regiment commanded the stormers, and led in person that half of them (200 strong) which was furnished by the Light Division; whilst the other half, furnished by the 2d Division, was led by Major James Armstrong of the 49th.

Lord Raglan determined that the assault should be delivered exclusively against the flanks of the Work which our people had surnamed 'the Quarries'; and this decision proved fortunate; for in the quarters thus marked for attack, the ground had not, as elsewhere, been charged with any explosive machines.

Our artillery had been searching the Work of 'the Quarries' with a powerful fire; but all at once became silent. Then the two chosen bodies of stormers, led, on one flank, by their commander

Advance of our storming parties.

Colonel Campbell of the 90th in person, on the other, by Major Armstrong of the 49th, advanced on the enemy's trenches without, it seems, firing a shot, and—unchecked by Ditch, or by parapet, or by what General Todleben says was the strenuous resistance of the Russian soldiery—pushed forward so resolutely that in spite of their scanty numbers they swiftly broke into the Work. They thus gave the warrant of successful experience to that wise reliance on the quality of his soldiers

*Their success of the
Work.*

which had induced Lord Raglan to avoid, if he could, heavy loss by delivering the intended attack with only a few valiant men. These, however, were quickly supported by the troops assigned for the purpose, and by the strong working-party of the 55th Regiment under Captain Cure, which having been previously ordered to throw down their tools and stand to their arms, drove the enemy at the point of the bayonet from the trench they attacked. The conquest quickly embraced not only the Work of the Quarries, but the foremost of the collateral entrenchments, thence extending far eastward across the whole Woronzoff Ridge. High praise was awarded to Captain Elton for the skilful, resolute way in which, with some 55th men, he fended off the enemy's troops from some of our people then labouring to reverse a captured parapet.*

Capture of the collateral emmena.

Colonel Campbell, at the head of his men, was wounded—twice wounded—without being therefore disabled; but of the forces he led, no great proportion were stricken whilst busied in storming the Work. There were several of them who fell, but fell at a later moment. Major Armstrong for instance, the chief who had led the storming forces contributed by the 2d Division, was severely wounded; but, when the ball reached him, he—acting on one flank, and Campbell besides on the other—had already made good their attack.

Overthrown at their foremost entrenchments

* The high honour of the Victoria Cross was granted to Captain, now Colonel F. Elton.

C H A P.
V.Flight of the defenders, pursued by our troops.Our men in the extreme front.The tasks yet awaiting our people.Major Armstrong.

the Russians were soon driven out from every part of the field-work, and they fled back into the fortress with a loss of two officers and a hundred men. Pursuing the fugitives eagerly, our few soldiers pressed their way forward to spots where the ground offered something like shelter against the guns of the Fortress, and thence searched the embrasures of the Great Redan in their front with a keenly sustained rifle-fire.

Far from proving to be a sheer blessing, the defeat of the enemy's troops laid open the counter-approach to a fire of great guns more destructive than the efforts of Russian infantry; and on the whole it was plain that, although for the moment victorious, heavy tasks yet awaited our people; for, if striving by work carried on under the fire of great batteries to effect—to effect before morning—a fairly tenable lodgment on the ground that their stormers had won, and to connect it with their system of trenches, they also would have, if they could, to withstand all such efforts to recover his counter-approach as the enemy might make in the night-time.

Though disabled in body—not mind—by his dangerous wound, Major Armstrong was so good a soldier as to be carefully thinking already of this last imperious exigency. His men wanting to carry him to the rear, he forbade them, saying firmly:—'No, no; lay me down at the bottom of 'the Ditch; for we can't spare a man till we know 'whether the enemy will attempt a recapture.'(*) Notwithstanding his wounds received in storming the Work, Colonel Campbell accepted and CHAP.

V. throughout retained supreme command in the Quarries, not only of the original attacking force and supports, but of all the reinforcements brought up in the course of the night.

Colonel
Campbell's
command.

The commander of the working-party of the 49th Regiment, which the 2d Division had furnished, was Colonel Thornton Grant, whom we have known, if so one may speak, since the morning of the Inkerman day. Whilst overlooking his men, Grant found himself at the side of Colonel Tylden, the gifted Engineer officer whom again and again we have seen where the fighting was thickest. Even he, even Tylden himself was for one instant doubting whether under the fire—the murderous fire—of artillery which now swept the site of the projected constructions, it would be possible for mortal men to execute the task ordained; but convincing himself the next moment that, unless a communication and lodgment could be made good before morning, the victory achieved by our stormers would prove to be all in vain, he resolved that at even a sacrifice so great as to seem appalling, the needed work must be done. What he followed—unknowingly—was the logic of him who once said: "It is necessary to sail: it is not necessary to live." Grant warmly concurring, and trustful in the valour of his 49th men, undertook to propel the execution of the work which was to connect the newly won ground with our system of trenches at the point called 'Eger-ton's Pit.'

Colonel Grant's meeting with Colonel Tylden.

CHAP.
V.

The great strain put on the powers of those who remained.

Colonel
Tylden.

Thornton
Grant.
Elphinstone.

Of the men brought up as 'working-parties,' so large a proportion were summoned to act as combatants in the fights one after another, of which we shall presently hear, that, to execute the needed works with only the few 'hands' remaining, was a formidable task.* There however were happily present some officers of great zeal and energy who might be trusted to go to the utmost of what mortal men could do. In darkness more or less thick, they toiled through the night, and on the whole under conditions which (except as regarded some few) made it hard for a chief in authority, however painstaking and anxious, to award them the praise they deserved. Yet without overpassing the limits of even official recognition, we see the names of six officers whose valorous exertions were soon brought to light—the name first and foremost of Colonel Tylden, the commanding Engineer, the names of Colonel Thornton Grant, of Captain Browne, of Lieutenant Elphinstone, of Lieutenant Anderson of the 96th.

The sixth name was that of a young officer of the 90th Regiment, whom a casual observer would call a strangely bright-looking boy. Now, however—with pickaxe in hand—this boy (as he seemed) was devoting a mighty zeal—zeal governed by knowledge and skill—to the cardinal purpose in hand. He was one who (as now the world knows) had a life of warlike glory before C H A P.

* It is said that after deducting the numbers thus summoned to throw down their tools and stand to their arms, there remained only 250 for the needed work.

V. him. Though seeming much younger, he was really twenty-one years of age. Twenty-one years of age, yet already distinguished for the number and the brilliancy of his warlike services, Captain —then Lieutenant—Wolseley had come out to the Crimea in the midst of the terrible winter. Within a few days from the time of his landing, he had courted hardship and work by volunteering to serve as an engineer in the trenches; and it is still as an acting engineer that we first see him busied in this evening of the 7th of June. From a work—discontinued soon afterwards—on a part of the ground further east he was summoned to replace an engineer officer who had been killed at the Quarries; and thenceforth till the morning hour which found him exchanging all other toil for the toil of a desperate fight, he shared in the strenuous efforts by which our people were striving to connect the works newly captured with Egerton's Pit, and to form, before break of day, what, however imperfect, might prove to be a tenable lodgment. The loss of blood caused by a wound received at an earlier hour did not slacken his powerful energies; and, although he was destined to touch—was destined even to pass—the actual physical limit, of what angry Nature allows in the way of bodily effort, we shall not see him robbed of his strength by either the work or the fighting he chose to go through till the object of his toil had been reached and the difficult victory won.

Captain,
now General
Viscount Wolseley,
G.C.B.

CHAP.
V.

Whilst thus the men of our 'working-parties' were striving to connect the Work of the 'Quarries' with the trenches of Gordon's Attack, and to effect such a lodgment, or inchoate lodgment as might afterwards enable fresh 'hands' to continue the task under daylight, their comrades in arms were sustaining with checkered fortunes a series of obstinate fights.

Contests made between two opposite batteries.

In contests for field works so placed that they can be brought under fire by opposing batteries, men oftentimes find it more easy to wrest the coveted prize from their enemy's hands, than to hold it fast after the capture.* Our people were destined all night to be either under the fire of powerful batteries, or—at intervals—meeting the onslaught of troops intent on recapture.

Boudistcheff's
attack.

At the head of a powerful body of Russian troops drawn from the Kamtchatka, the Volhynia, and the Minsk regiments, Captain Boudistcheff of the Imperial Navy strove hard to retake the counter-approaches (<sup>5</sup>) ; but was stubbornly met by the English in spite of their scanty numbers. Captain Boudistcheff the commander of the assaulting force was wounded and taken prisoner by our people, and Khomenko the commander of the Kamtchatka battalion was killed. Still the English were forced back a good way by the weight of the assailing mass, and were even, it seems, for the moment driven out of the field-

Attack-
tions.

* We saw, ante, vol. viii. pp. 207 et seq., an instance in which the Russians seemed to act on that conviction.

work, carrying with them, however, their distinguished prisoner the commander Boudistcheff, who had fallen wounded into their hands. After making a rally, and re-entering the field-work, our people once more engaged the enemy, and bewildered or depressed by the loss of both Boudistcheff and Khomenko, the Russians faltered a while, but again were led on by Captain Reutlinger of the Engineers, and they rescued the valiant Boudistcheff their wounded commander; but presently, Reutlinger himself was wounded in the head; and our people returning to the charge drove all the Russians out of the Work and back once more into the fortress. The young Engineer officer, Lieutenant Lowry, had survived the perilous task of conducting one of our storming-parties, but long after, was killed whilst rallying our men in the night-time for this last victorious charge.

Somewhat later, and when the night had become more dark than before, another attempt to recover the counter-approaches was made by the Volhynia regiment, then forming a single battalion. Though the effort was resisted by our people with great determination and energy, the regiment under Colonel Snelkoff its chief proved able to enter the Work, but under a fresh effort made by the English soldiery was presently forced to yield ground. After falling back upon the second line of the counter-approaches the Volhynia regiment rallied and made a rush upon the counter-approaches in front, but, its Colonel being

CHAP.
V.The English
driving the Russians back into their fortress.Attack made by the Volhynia regiment.Its progress;and final discomfiture.

CHAP.
V.Conditions under which our troops fought.

then wounded, and fresh troops reinforcing our people, the enemy was again driven back and fled once more to find shelter behind the works of the fortress.

Colonel
Shirley.

Maintained on each side with valour and obstinacy, these several infantry conflicts must needs have involved serious loss; yet the periods of time that they occupied were those perhaps when our men suffered less than they did during all the other hours of darkness; for, whilst mingled in fight with the enemy's troops, they were spared from the fire of the place, but always underwent it again (without having yet obtained cover) so soon as they had defeated their assailants and thrust them back into the fortress.

Of course under such conditions there was need of the ability with which, as we know, Colonel Shirley conducted the fight, and especially of the moderation and judgment with which he brought up reinforcements, neither suffering the conflict to end for want of men to sustain it, nor pouring in heavy masses—to fall in proportionate numbers—beneath the guns of the fortress. Lord Raglan declared that the manner in which Colonel Shirley conducted 'this arduous service' entitled him to the highest praise.*

Another
Russian
column advancing to attempt the recapture.

Not long before daybreak, and when indeed some observed the first faint glimmer of twilight, the enemy launched a fresh column against our wearied soldiery, and once more challenged their hold of the long disputed field-work. The column advanced up a dell that opened in front of our people at a distance of more than 200 yards, and, whilst still in the hollow, was seen by Colonel Campbell and Captain Wolseley, both of the 90th, as well as by other officers. They hastened at once to prepare all the means of resistance at hand by summoning the men within reach to rise up from the ground where they lay, to meet the approaching attack; but a startling disappointment awaited them. During the last ten hours of fighting and working, the physical strength of our men had been heavily taxed—taxed so closely up to its limit that, except as regarded a few (of whom we shall presently hear), they had fallen into a state which many, perhaps, might describe as one of faintness, or syncope; but what at all events ailed them was exhaustion of the power which alone can put muscles in action. They could not be roused; and, when lifted, could hardly, if at all, keep their feet.*

* To Secretary of State, 9th June 1856.

An enemy's column advancing, and before them British troops lying helpless as though stricken and nailed to the ground by some hellish enchantment! 'It seemed to me,' said one officer present, 'like the end of the world.' However, some few of our officers—including Colonel Campbell and Captain Wolseley, and also several sergeants and corporals, with some men of the rank and file, making up altogether a strength variously computed at from one to three score—began

CHAP.
V.

Prostrate state of most of our men.

Show of resistance attempted by some officers and men.

* See post, p. 128 et seq., as to state of two officers afterwards stricken in this way.

CHAP.
V. to act together, and they all instinctively sought to make the very most of their scanty numbers by firing into the column (our officers firing even their pistols), but also by vehement cheering; and happily one alert bugler became a host in himself, for—pouring out the glad notes which govern the movement of troops—he wrought on the imaginations of men, and peopled the darkness with phantoms of a soldiery obeying his call.

Its effect.

The Russian column fluttering and com-ing
to a stop;

and falling back.

The English
at break of day still retaining their hold.

The share Fortune had in bringing about this result.

The seemingly shallow expedient of attempting a show of resistance with means such as those which were used might pass with many grave men as an inopportune sort of mockery; but—favoured of course by the darkness scarce yielding as yet to dim twilight—the effort, however desperate, produced a strange, sudden effect. The enemy's column began to falter, then stopped. Then—at first with gestures of encouragement and entreaty, but afterwards with indications of violent rage, with efforts to drag the men forward by their collars, and even to enforce obedience by blows from the flats of their swords, the Russian officers could be seen trying hard to make their people come on. They laboured, however, in vain, and the column began to fall back. This abortive attempt was the last, and the morning that now quickly dawned found our people still holding the Work.

In general, the Russian soldiery were no less obedient than brave, and the refusal of a powerful body composed of such men to advance at a critical moment sprang plainly from one of those freaks of the imagination which often mislead the best troops when attempting a night attack. It may therefore be said that our people owed this, their definitive victory, to one of the chances of war. Still, if any one thinks for a moment of what we called the 'show of resistance'—the appeal of the single bugler, the touching recourse to small pistols, the shouts (instead of a volley!) opposed to a column of infantry—he will say that, though Fortune took part in this the last of the conflicts repeated during the night, she at least (as is often her wont) ranged herself on the side of bold men—men who hardly, it seems, entertained any rational hope, yet—superbly deficient in logic—refused nevertheless to despair.

Whilst thus happily achieving their tasks of the more strictly combative sort, our people had also done more; for with only a few 'hands,' and—in general—working under strong fire they had connected the newly won field-work with Eger-ton's Pit by a fairly sufficient 'boyan,' and moreover had thrown up a parapet—consisting of gabions and barrels, but also in part of dead bodies—on the captured ground, thus providing such means as might render it possible to continue the work under daylight, and entitling themselves to hope that their seizure, and night-long defence of what our men called 'the Quarries' would ripen into a conquest.

We spoke of men lying helpless because they had passed the limits of what human beings could do in the way of hard toil; and it hap-

CHAP.
V.

Execution
meanwhile
of the needed
work.

CHAP. pened, though not till after the fight, that the V. very two officers whom we saw taking a foremost part in the desperate 'show of resistance' were both made to suffer the penalty of working too hard and too long. The fatigue (with a load of anxiety) which the chief, Colonel Campbell, endured on that night of the 7th of June was so great that even five weeks afterwards he had not recovered from the overstrain put on his energies.*
 The other example was that of a man but twenty-one years of age. Although Captain Wolseley had been engaged on active duty incessantly since the morning of the 7th, his power of exertion continued until the victory had been definitively won. (6) Then Nature gave way. Unable to stand, he fell helpless among the slain; and,
 when lifted up, by the strength of others, stood only to fall again. He was conscious, and could speak, but only in a very faint whisper. We find a clue to the nature of his ailment by learning what cured it. Some twenty-four hours of sleep restored to him full life and health.

It was not without submitting to painful sacrifices that our people achieved this hard conquest, a conquest of what—measured strictly—was only a ribbon of ground, but still one that helped on the siege.

* See his despatch of 13th July 1855 to Sir James Simpson.

VIII.

In killed, wounded, and missing, the Russians lost 5000;* the French 5500;† the English nearly 700, of whom no less than 47 were officers.‡

The French took from the enemy 73 pieces of spoilt ordnance, of which all except six were of heavy calibre.§

IX.

The Allies soon reversed, and turned to their own use, the works they had wrested from the enemy; so that what had been the two White Redoubts, the Kamtchatka Lunette, and the counter-approach called the 'Quarries,' all powerfully defending Sebastopol, now marked the front newly advanced from which the Allies would spring out to make their attack on the fortress.

By establishing batteries on the new positions thus won, the Allies pressed their siege with a stringency greatly increased; and one result seemingly was that thenceforth there remained but one quarter in which the inhabitants or the men of the garrison could loiter or pass without risk.||

* Todleben, vol. ii. p. 333.

† More exactly 5448. Niel, p. 301.

‡ More exactly 671, being the number shown in Journal of Royal Engineers, when corrected by the addition of two casualties omitted by mistake in the Return.

§ Niel, p. 298.

|| Ernshoff.

CHAP.
V.

Continuance of the Third Bonbardment.

the losses
it caused.

X.

The fire of siege-guns we saw open on the afternoon of the 6th was continued on the morrow, and during the three following days. This artillery effort was called the Third Bombardment, and it inflicted on the Russians a loss of 3507 men, the Allies, it seems, only losing under the fire of the responding batteries 150 each day.*

* Todleben, vol. ii. pp. 339, 340. We have already seen (ante, vol. viii. p. 187) why the Russians submitted to great sacrifices whilst under bombardment.

CHAPTER VI.

THE SIEGE AND DEFENCE CARRIED ON TO THE CLOSE OF THE FOURTH BOMBARDMENT.

I.

THE victorious achievements of the 7th of June CHAP.
did not even for a moment allay that spirit of VI.
obstinate antagonism which divided Louis Napoleon from his strong-willed general; and indeed the huge sacrifice of men by which the French army had purchased its recent advantages gave the Emperor a powerful leverage that he could and would use against the recusant Pélissier; for of course the ruler might say—might say, as he imagined, with truth—that the idea of incurring such losses as had to be numbered by thousands in order to conquer mere stepping-stones a few hundred yards in advance was unworthy of any comparison with the dream he had dreamt and was dreaming—the dream of a new ‘Great St Bernard’ discovered by a new Bonaparte amongst the passes of the Tchatir Dagh, with, beyond it, another Marengo.

Continued
strife between the French Emperor and Pélissier.

CHAP.
VI.

So, after having received the prompt congratulations of Queen Victoria expressed in the most gracious terms, Pélissier had to wait a whole week for any recognition at all on the part of his own angry sovereign, and was then at last greeted by words giving praise indeed to the troops, but—constructively—blaming the general, and approaching him yet once again with hard, peremptory words of dictation—words commanding him to do, and do quickly the opposite of what he thought right—the opposite of what he was doing. 'Before,' wrote the Emperor on the 14th of June, 'before congratulating you on the brilliant success you obtained on the 7th, I wished to know what sacrifices it had cost. I now learn the extent of them from St Petersburg. I admire the courage of the troops, but observe that a pitched battle disposing of the fate of the Crimea would not have cost more men. I persist then in the order I have caused to be given you by the Minister of War, to bend all your efforts to the object of resolutely taking the field.'

The language used by Pélissier whilst resisting the imperial orders, had been hitherto of a varied kind; for, though oftentimes savage and fierce, not trying to hide his scorn, he had also in other moods chosen to be either immensely adroit, or cleverly or openly evasive, or again to be mystifying his correspondent with appeals to the Doctrine of sieges, and the sacred authority of Vauban; condescending besides now and then to toss in some phrase of few syllables that made a thin show of loyalty; but, whilst thus lightly fencing with words, he had always in action proved stubborn, doing simply what he himself chose, and nothing that the Emperor ordered.<sup>(1)</sup>

CHAP.
VI.

But when answering the Emperor's letter of the 14th of June, Pélissier altered his tone. No longer evasive, he was graver, more stern. He stood fiercely at bay. He told the Emperor plainly that the full execution of his orders was 'impossible'; declared that those orders subjected him to the alternative of either resisting authority, or dishonouring himself by obeying it, and prayed that by his Majesty's orders he might be either set free from the narrow limits assigned him, or allowed to resign the command—a command he described as one 'impossible to exercise 'in concert with our loyal allies, at the sometimes 'paralysing extremity of an electric wire.'

For any answer at all to this stern despatch Pélissier was kept waiting in vain throughout the whole day and the night of the 17th of June.

The truth is that, whilst torturing Pélissier by perverse interference the Emperor was himself under tortures of the kind that needs must be suffered by any distracted mortal who long and anxiously hesitates on a question he deems to be vital. To be treated as a dreamy civilian by one of his generals was mortifying of course to his vanity, and subversive of his curious pretension to rule as a quasi-Napoleon; yet at a time so big * Pélissier to the Emperor, 16th June 1855.

C H A P.
VI.

with fate as the one at last reached, —the eve, as it were, of a battle,—he could not but see staring danger in so bold a measure as that of removing Péliſſier from the command of an army drawn up in the enemy's presence. It may be that the French in the Crimea would have regarded the withdrawal of their commander with somewhat mixed feelings, for many of them deemed him a chief who was prodigal—unduly prodigal—of the lives of his men ; but it is believed that the French army elsewhere—more especially the army in France, which gave what there was of security to the second French Empire—would have looked with ill favour on the change, and even perhaps with grave anger. Be that as it may, the Emperor faltered, and, as is usual with men in his state, sent dubious, weak, clashing words. ‘Certainly,’ said the Emperor to Péliſſier, ‘I have confidence in you, but that does not prevent me from having my personal conviction. Besides, there is nothing dishonouring to a general in executing the orders of his Government if he believes them capable of being executed. It was thus that the Kertch Expedition took place by orders of the English Government.(2) If the instructions of the 14th are too absolute, modify them ; but it is impossible to close one's eyes to the evidence, and to refrain from telling you’—here again supervened the old dream—‘that the key of the Crimea is at Simphéropol, and that an expedition like that of Kertch, but with double the strength, and landing at Aloushta and holding Simphé-

'pol, would have a more decisive effect than all the bloody attacks against Sebastopol.' *

CHAP.
VI

If the Emperor thus still continued to harp on the plan he had formed, this was plainly because none had told him of the curiously signal collapse which his cherished design underwent so long since as the middle of May. Enquiry then pursued in the Crimea had made it appear, as we saw, that for the defence of the Allied position—a task all agreed to be vital—there would be needed no less than 90,000 men who (for reasons disclosed at the time) would have to be all either French, or French and English combined; † and it is only after allowing for this immense exigency that Pélissier's stern design can rightly be put in comparison with Louis Napoleon's project. Under General Pélissier's plan of firmly pressing the siege, the Allies—by simply their presence—would be amply sufficing for all defensive purposes, yet meanwhile would also be free to put forth their full strength in attack. Under the Emperor's plan, on the contrary, if amended to meet the huge exigency of the enquiring Commission, the 90,000 men furnished for the defence of the position would be all, as it were, standing sentry, doing nothing besides towards the object in hand; and it is obvious that any proposal would almost stand self-condemned, if it sought to with-

Louis Napoleon unaware of the way in which his plan had collapsed

* Rousset, vol. ii. p. 258.

† See ante, vol. VIII. p. 294, and note. By agreement, the Sardinians were exempt from siege duties, and Omar Pasha held that the Turks had a like immunity.

CHAP.
VI
draw 90,000 of the Anglo-French troops from all share in the coming attacks.

How the Emperor (against his own wishes) prevented all recourse to field
operations.

In parting at last with that subject of the superincumbent plan which during several months had hampered the cause of the Allies, one may say that the idea of resorting to some sort of field operations well deserved to be considered with care, but all the wishes formed by the Emperor in that general direction were balked by his own course of action. He tenaciously coupled his longing for field operations with the eccentric, fanciful plan of an Alpine excursion from Aloushta; and on the other hand, he insisted with almost passionate energy that no enterprise against the enemy's flank or rear should be attempted from Eupatoria.

Well, enquiry in the Crimea convinced people there that the idea of an advance into the mountains from Aloushta was rash, was even wild, yet also satisfied many (including amongst others Lord Raglan) that a plan of attacking the Russian field army from Eupatoria might be well carried into effect;<sup>(2)</sup> and what forbade a resort to that last simple measure was the antipathy it excited in the mind of Louis Napoleon. He, in short, had constructed a plan which, however enchanting to himself, was by others considered absurd; and the one that others approved he ran down with singular vehemence.

In this way, though eager for field operations, be effectually prevented recourse to any such scheme of action.

The electric communication between France and Pélissier's headquarters had been made too complete to leave room for what people call the 'cross purposes' occasioned in old times by distance; yet it was with the equivocal despatch we last quoted—one expressing confidence, but importing distrust, and ending with the obsolete subject of a fancied campaign in the open—that the Emperor thus interposed—interposed, in the midst of a battle. When he sent off his message, the preparative bombardment of the 17th of June had been raging for several hours.

For, Pélissier, whilst kept in suspense, adhered all the time to his practice of meeting the Emperor's orders by actions which set them at naught; and unflinchingly went on preparing to execute his great siege attacks without knowing whether his fate—his fate within the next hour—would be to command the French army with the latitude on which he insisted, or not to command it at all.

Course taken by Pélissier.

II.

In maintaining these struggles against his sovereign, Pélissier, after all, was resisting the then actual 'law' of his country; and, although this strong and proud man was accustomed to mask his sense of pain by outbursts of uncontrolled rage, he suffered, bitterly suffered, under words of rebuke and command, all importuning that the ter

The afflic-tion endured
by Pélissier;

CHAP.
VI.

---

its apparent effect on his judgment during nearly eight days.

rible sacrifices of men he had made and was going to make would receive no sanction in France from the constituted Chief of the State. Writing to the War Minister, he declared himself to be 'afflicted' by the course that the Emperor was taking against him.* It is true that the torture of mind thus endured by Pélissier did not bend him by even a hair's-breadth in the direction of the Emperor's wishes, but—perhaps by interfering with sleep—it seems to have weakened his judgment, and this at a critical time, extending over eight days, from the close of the 10th of June.

Of course, men are free, if they choose, to question the simple inference which sees in torture of mind close followed by failing judgment the relation of 'cause and effect'; but, whatever brought about such a change, the lowered degree of ability displayed by Pélissier in the course of those anxious 'eight days' is brought under so strong a light by contrasting it with the really great qualities he showed to the world both before and soon after the interval that this difference has become a proved fact—a proved fact making it certain that, whilst the brief interval lasted, he did not retain full command of the powers that Nature had given him.

*Changes
during the interval undergone by Pélissier's mind.*

It was during this interposed period of no more than eight days that Pélissier's mind underwent three ill-omened changes of purpose, and impelled him besides in one instance to tear himself loose from the bonds of concerted action with a recklessness and haste not excused by any sound war- CHAP.

* 10th June 1855. Roussel, vol. ii. p. 256.

like reason, or even any reason at all. VI.

On the 10th of June, General Pélissier was believed to be still, as before, in full accord with Lord Raglan, and, meeting in conference, the delegate generals of the French and the English commanders then concurred in approving and framing a plan of attack which was to include the town front;* but Pélissier afterwards chose to discard that part of the scheme;† and the enemy was thus to be spared from that very assault—an assault of the Flagstaff Bastion—which more than all else he had dreaded. Assuming—though not on good grounds—that if his troops should lay hold of the Flagstaff Bastion, they could and would enter the town, Pélissier got to imagine (as Canrobert had imagined before him) that dispersing themselves through the streets, and there, for a while running riot, they would lapse into an uncontrolled state, bringing thus on themselves, to begin with, but afterwards on the besiegers at large, some grave disaster;‡ He therefore resolved, in antagonism to Lord Raglan's opinion, and to that of, besides, some French generals, including General Niel—that his attacks should be confined to the Faubourg. He so resolved, though the French engaged before the town front had sapped up to within a short distance of the 10th of June, full accord between Pélissier

and Lord Raglan.

Pélissier
discarding the idea of assaulting the town front.

* Plan signed by Generals Niel, Thiry, Harry Jones, and Daress, given in Journal Royal Engineers, vol. ii. p. 286 & seq.

† See his despatch, Rousset, vol. ii. p. 264.

‡ Lord Raglan (whose means of knowing were trustworthy) to Lord Panmure, June 19, 1855.

CHAP.
VI.

---

enemy's works, whilst all the Allies on the contrary who craned from their foremost trenches in the Karabelnaya were divided from the opposite counterscarps by several hundreds of yards.

Lord Raglan lamented the change. It was not for him to judge whether the French ranged before the town front could or not have defeated their adversaries; but he set a great value on any assaults towards the west, which would there have detained a great number of the enemy's troops, and prevented their taking a part in the fights for the Karabelnaya.*

His removal of Bosquet from command in the Karabelnaya.

The next change made by Péliſſier was one of a hazardous kind. Finding that Bosquet did not agree with him in his plan of attacking the Faubourg without first sapping up to close quarters with its works of defence, the chief became hotly enraged; and, after besides laying stress on an act of omission which had given him grave offence, he broke with the general who thus had ruffled his temper—the general then commanding in front of the Karabelnaya who would otherwise have had the direction of all the projected assaults.(*) It was greatly of course to be wished that the general charged to direct the intended assaults should be a man fully imbued with the ideas of the Commander-in-Chief, fully sharing his most eager hopes, and, if frankly aiming at agreement, or—alternatively—at some change of plan, consultations pursued by the chief with his richly experienced lieutenant might have brought about happy results, more especially had it been possible that, instead of remaining misguided by his own fallacious opinion, Pélissier would carefully listen to the counsels of Bosquet, whose judgment on the question in hand was, as now we know, sound.*

* Lord Raglan to Lord Panmure, Private, 19th June 1855

CHAP.
VI.

But Pélissier's state of mind and of temper did not suffer him to brook opposition, and he hastened to take a course that perhaps he then believed to be 'vigorous,' though, in truth, as he afterwards learnt, it was violent rather than strong, and more likely to advantage the enemy than either himself or his cause. Directing General Bosquet to undertake duties elsewhere, Pélissier removed him—uprooted him—from his command in the Karabelnaya, and replaced him by General Regnault St Jean d'Angély, the officer then at the head of the Division of the Imperial Guard.

To do thus was to withdraw from the scene of real conflict an able, a victorious commander well knowing the ground, and well known to the troops, to withdraw him on the eve of an action, and besides to raise up in his stead a newly come man, then a stranger almost to the army, and one but little acquainted with the field of the intended attacks.†

* So afterwards proved by experience convincing to all, including General Pélissier.

† The change (strongly censured by Rousset, and presumably disapproved at his office, the Ministry of War) was made on the 16th of June, and, next day, the preparative bombardment was to open.

CHAP. VI.— Thus was only the second of the principal changes that General Péliſſier wrought within the ill-omened ‘eight days.’

III.

Designed movement on the Tchernaya.

Péliſſier’s measures included a feint on the Tchernaya effected with troops of all arms—troops which likewise would be charged to fend off any onset in that quarter hazarded by the Russian Field Army. The command of this force was the one to which Bosquet found himself shifted.

Main design of the Allies against the Karabelnaya.

Their plan of a preliminary bombardment.

The main purpose of the Allies, French and English, comprised only a set of attacks to be delivered by infantry on the 18th of June against the greater part of the works which defended the Karabelnaya. To open a way for these onslaughts, and to protract the enemy’s anxiety in regard to his defences elsewhere, the day next before these attacks was to be occupied in bombarding—not simply the works of the Faubourg but—the whole south front of Sebastopol.

IV.

The fourth bombardment.

Accordingly at break of day on the 17th of June, the French and the English began to deliver their fourth bombardment. Their fleets* (where fleets could act), and elsewhere far more extensively their now greatly strengthened siege-batteries, brought under a vast arc of fire the whole south front of Sebastopol from the Quarantine Fort on the west to that 'Battery of the 'Point' which, as always before, still marked its eastermost limit. Apart from the fire of the ships, it was with nearly 600 siege-guns that the Allies were able to execute this great bombardment, and the number of the pieces of ordnance with which the enemy answered them was about 550.* On the Karabelnaya defences (where alone the attack would be real) the Allies poured a fire of 280 siege-guns, 114 being French and 166 of them English.† To this fire on the Karabelnaya, the enemy answered with guns that numbered 207.‡ Maintaining the cannonade until night-fall the allied gunners grievously mutilated the enemy's defences, and inflicted moreover upon him heavy losses of men. Before sunset, the Flagstaff Bastion and the works further west had suffered great havoc; and in the Faubourg (where the bombardment was meant to open paths for the infantry) the results were more strongly marked. The Barrack Battery, the Great Redan, the Gervais Battery, the Malakoff, with its auxiliary works, the Little Redan and the Battery of the Point, were reduced to a nearly helpless state. Indeed the Malakoff could no longer maintain any fire at all, and it was the same with the Nikonoff Battery and the Little

* At the cost of a precious life—that of young Lyons of the Muranda.

CHAP.
VI.

* The number according to Todleben (vol. ii. p. 250) being 540.

† Rousset, vol. ii. p. 255.      ‡ Todleben, vol. ii. p. 250.

CHAP.
VI Redan.* The enemy under this cannonade lost many officers of high distinction, including the valiant Boudistcheff, and a great number of gunners; but also (as in former bombardments) the cruel necessity of having to keep bodies of infantry under fire by way of precaution so greatly augmented his losses as to bring up the number of his killed and wounded to no less than 4000.† The losses of the Allies were confined to only a few score of men.(§)

Reply of Russian
batteries.

There was a failure of ammunition at one time in some of the enemy's batteries, and his gunners suffered so frightfully under the fire of the besiegers that in some of the works it was necessary to replace them by infantry men whose skill in the working of ordnance was greatly inferior; but the enemy apparently thought that in spite of these checks he had effectively answered the Allies with the 19,000 shots he delivered in the course of the day.

This regarded by the besiegers as weak.

The effect like that of a stratagem.

The Allies
 lulled into a faith that Sebastopol was ready to fall.

The besiegers on the other hand judged that the garrison had answered but weakly to their mighty bombardment; and, although there is no ground for saying that the enemy refrained of set purpose from doing his best, the discomfiture he underwent in this strife of guns against guns produced all the effect of a stratagem profoundly contrived. The Allies, French and English alike, were lulled into what at the time was a pleasant belief—a belief that, after having wrought wonders by the development of his artillery power, the enemy was coming at last to the end of his long-strained resources, and they imagined—not perhaps wrongly—that the Faubourg of the Karabelnaya—carrying with it the fate of Sebastopol—was ripe for assault. But with those who called to mind the immense and effective repairs which the enemy had so often achieved in the course of a night, it did not follow at all that the then ruined state of the Karabelnaya defences could be fairly expected to last until break of day on the morrow.

* Todleben, vol. II. pp. 363, 364.

+ Ibid., p. 330.

The results of Pélissier's fierce war against all the 'town counter-approaches,' the triumphs of the Kertch Expedition, the joyful return of the victors, fresh, unending accessions of troops, the conquests, already made good, of the Selinghinsk and Volhynia Redoubts, the Kamtchatka Lunette, and the 'Quarries'—these welcomed gains upon gains had been acting of late on the hopes of the besiegers with great, with increasing effect; and, when now in the afternoon hours of Sunday the 17th of June, they saw, or got to know of the havoc inflicted by their great cannonade, whilst observing, too, what—to their eyes—seemed the desperate plight of the garrison, there swept through the camps, French and English, an un-governed flood of Opinion—Opinion making sure Exultant in camp. that the fortress must fall, and fall the next day.
Opinion

No general of course can find pardon for any mistake made in war by saying he was carried away by a torrent of feeling in camp; but the all-pervading faith entertained by myriads and

CHAP.
VI.

myriads of soldiers collected on one shred of ground is nevertheless a real force that, in justice to the memory of the French commander—then about to commit a grave fault—ought not to be wholly ignored.

The force of this belief;Its impact on the troubled mind of Pélissier.

This force of gathered opinion was in one point of view a good sign, because showing the ardour of the troops; but its impact on the mind of Pélissier—not yet at the end of that interval of eight days which we had to point out—was likely to do grievous harm. Long kept, as we have seen, under torture by his obstinate sovereign, he was conducting the business of war at a critical time with a temper exasperated by Imperial dictation, and therefore—for this would follow—with nerves highly, painfully strung. On a Chief in that state the effect of a great warlike passion carrying with it the troops of two armies might be such as to precipitate action.

Lord Raglan
sharing the belief of the camp;but not moved towards changes
of plan.

Lord Raglan has freely confessed that he shared the illusory confidence extending over the camps; but remaining throughout calm and firm, he did not allow mere elation to vary his chosen course. It is in open campaigning much more than in any siege process that the abnormal fervour of troops can be prudently used as a reason for altering the designs of a Chief.

V.

Morning of Sunday the 17th;

On the morning of this day, the 17th, the eve of the intended assaults, Pélissier had come to Lord Raglan at the English headquarters, and C H A P.

VI.
 imparted his designs for the morrow. To the entire satisfaction of Lord Raglan, he announced that his siege-guns would open with the daylight next morning, and continue their fire for two hours, thus accomplishing a second destruction of any resurgent batteries which the garrison might repair in the night-time. He also determined that at the close of the two hours' bombardment, that is, at five, or half-past five o'clock, his infantry should begin to deliver their intended assaults. With Pélissier's approval, Lord Raglan on his part determined to open his intended bombardment simultaneously with that of the French, but of the times when his infantry columns should begin their attacks he reserved to himself a free choice.

Pélissier
at the English
headquaters.

Concerted plans of the two commanders,

From some cause it happened that the choice of measures and time thus made at first by Pélissier lay hidden from Louis Napoleon, as well as from the French War Department, and therefore perhaps it is well to give Lord Raglan's words. ' General Pélissier said here on Sunday morning ' that it was desirable that the artillery should ' have a couple of hours after daylight the follow- ' ing morning to destroy any repairs the Russians ' might have made in the night, and that he ' should open the attack by the troops at five, ' or half-past five as his commanding officer of ' artillery on the spot might determine.' *

* To Lord Panmure, 19th June 1855.

C H A P.
VI.

Pélissier's
sudden change of purpose;

VI.

But unhappily in the evening of the 17th of June, the resolve of Pélissier underwent a change wild and abrupt. Whether duped by 'information' from some returned prisoner, or some deserter or spy, which told him that—ripe for conquest at once by the mere sight of infantry columns advancing against them at daybreak—the works of the Karabelnaya would fall, as it were, at his touch;* or whether—because at last weakened more than ever before by the tortures we saw him enduring at the hands of his sovereign—he simply was carried away by the flood of exultant Opinion then sweeping over the camp, he at all events made a rush headlong—a rush towards what was much worse than simply precipitate action.† not imparted at the time to Lord

Raglan.

Strange, flighty, and wrong as so great a dereliction must seem after what he had announced in the morning at the English headquarters, he did not consult Lord Raglan on the change he was making. He assembled some generals at his own headquarters, but they did not restrain him, and I treat the resolve as his own.

Its purport: He determined—determined irrevocably—that the further preparative measure of bombarding the enemy's works which was to have opened the

* This seems to have been widely believed in France, and the name of the deceiver used to be mentioned, but I have no proof that the conjecture was sound.

† Because, an attack that same evening would have been vastly more prudent and hopeful.

morrow's operations should by him be altogether omitted, and that the signal directing his infantry to commence their intended assaults should be given at three o'clock in the morning, that is, at the least two full hours before the time he had fixed in concert with the English commander. CHAP.
VI.

This abrupt change of plan on the part of ~~its~~ bearing Pélissier was substantially an actual reversal of what a few hours before he had voluntarily announced to Lord Raglan as his settled design. And, the change too was seemingly made in defiance of known conditions. The Allies at this time had nowhere sapped up to within a distance of less than several hundreds of yards off from the Karabelnaya enceinte, and—encumbered, as they would be with scaling-ladders, and other needed appliances—troops marching over such spaces in the teeth of mighty batteries restored to their original power might expect to encounter destruction, or at all events slaughter so great as would leave them unequal to the ulterior operation of carrying the defences by storm. Yet—so immense was the difference!—a march on those very same batteries, if still in the ruined state to which a bombardment could bring them, might be only, after all, a light matter. Now, experience had shown the Allies that to this state of ruin they could bring the defences by duly using their siege-guns, whilst also it had taught them that the batteries thus ruined, and rendered for the moment innocuous, could be restored by the garrison to a state of efficiency in the course of a night; and, although the advance of the year from April to the middle of June had abridged the length of the time dividing sunset from sunrise, there was no reason why the enemy should not meet this curtailment of the working hours by employing on the needed repairs a greater number of 'hands.'

CHAP.
VI.

By his plan announced in the morning Pélissier had rightly provided that the batteries to be faced by his troops should first be rendered innocuous by the powers of the siege-guns. The evening project was one that condemned all the infantry columns to traverse lengthened spaces—by daylight—in the teeth of destructive batteries no longer in ruined condition but restored to their original power. To any question which asks why Pélissier discarded the first, and rushed headlong into the perils of the second design, one only can answer that he had not yet come to the end of those troubled 'eight days,' during which his full power of wisely exerting the judgment underwent, as we saw, interruption, and that, when he effected his change, the mighty flood of opinion we saw exultant in camp was running its course with a strength that might carry away a chief tortured in the midst of his warlike cares by a raging strife with his sovereign. That Pélissier on the evening of the 17th was under some access of plainly abnormal excitement is proved, I think, by the fact that, when making up his mind to break loose from the perfect agreement attained a few hours before on his visit to the Question

why Pélissier thus acted.

English headquarters, and even to invert its CHAP.
provisions, he shunned that safe, wholesome, and VI obvious expedient of consulting with Lord Raglan in person which not only common prudence but obvious duty enjoined.

Pélissier's new resolve was imparted to our Engineer Chief; but imparted, it seems, as definitive, and in terms which—far from inviting—made bold to exclude all discussion.

Lord Raglan after visiting his Divisional camps, and giving what he thought for the night would be his definitive orders—orders all in conformity with the previously concerted plan—had ridden back to headquarters, and there, had scarce quitted his saddle, when he not only heard from the Chief of our Engineer force that Pélissier had made this ill change in his plan for the morrow, but also learnt that the new resolve was definitive, and even announced as one resting on grounds that allowed no dispute.*

Magnanimously regardless of any slight towards himself implied by Pélissier's conduct, Lord Raglan thought only of the public service. He judged that in the teeth of such an announcement by the commander of what (from its largely predominant numbers) one rightly might call the main body of the Anglo-French army, it would be perilous, confusing, unwise to attempt to enter into controversy with the French commander, or to protest against his sudden reversal of the plan

* The grounds I believe were announced as 'des raisons incontestables.'

CHAP.
VL

on which both had agreed, or lastly to persist in the course approved by the two commanders some hours before without suffering himself to be moved by the wild alteration since made; and therefore, whilst bitterly pained by his colleague's new and sudden resolve, he determined that the operations of the English on the morrow should be in conformity with Pélissier's altered design.

VII.

Night of the 17th
of June.

Lord Raglan gave his orders accordingly; and his troops before sunrise all reached the positions assigned them.

Movements of English and French
troops.

The marches of Pélissier's troops did not all take effect in good time. The brigades under Faucheux and Monteynard, which he had summoned from his camps in the west, received their orders too late; and, when ready to move, the troops under General Brunet were obstructed by finding that the trenches through which they received instructions to pass had not yet been left vacated for them by General d'Autemarre's forces.*

These movements described by
the enemy.

It was a beauteous midsummer night; and the stars in the heavens disclosed these marches of troops to a vigilant garrison, enabling their great Engineer to infer the design of the besiegers in its general bearing, and even to divine in some measure their special plans of attack.

* The cause of this error—not now material—is shown by Niel, p. 314.

The bombardment was maintained after dark, and throughout the whole of the night, but only by vertical fire; and, although this use of artillery inflicted grave losses on those brave men of the garrison who were striving to repair their crushed batteries, it did not so take effect as to make the repairing impossible.

To that object of repairing at night their ruined batteries the garrison did not fail to apply a high warlike spirit, and truly magnificent energies. Far from having yet come, as their adversaries fondly imagined, to the end of their mighty resources, far even from being discomfited by the shortness of a night in mid-June, they toiled on under a vertical fire pouring down with destructive power till they had fully restored their defences to an effective condition, and even at one point had added to the power of their batteries. It was only on that very night that Todleben crowned the ramparts of the Malakoff with field-guns placed en barbette which were destined to exert no small sway in the approaching engagement.

This constancy on the part of the garrison was soon to have its reward.

CHAP.
VI.

---

Bombardment at night by vertical fire.

The enemy repairing and even augmenting his batteries

CHAPTER VII

EIGHTEENTH OF JUNE. — ABORTIVE ATTACKS OF THE ALLIES ON THE KARABELNAYA DEFENCES. — THE VICTORIOUS OPERATION EFFECTED BY GENERAL EVRE.

I.

CHAP.
VII
Whilst under cover of darkness not yet dispersed or dispersing, the garrison still was engaged in restoring its artillery power, another arm of the service had already begun to make ready for the approaching strife.

The infantry of the garrison were preparing to fulfil its task.
The garrison made aware of the besiegers' designs; and preparing accordingly.

The garrison had found itself able to infer the designs of the besiegers from the preparative marching of their columns discerned through the imperfect darkness of a fair summer night; and, so early as two o'clock in the morning, the bugles of infantry regiments were sounding this way and that, all over the Karabelnaya. Soon, infantry men standing up on the crowded banquettes were not only manning the ramparts, but showing their presence in numbers that surprised a beholder not versed in General Todleben's Art. The truth is, as we know, that, whilst trusting in the main to great guns, the indefatigable defender of Sebastopol had been minded nevertheless from the first to ally with his blasts of mitraille a powerful musketry-fire. It was for this special service that infantry crowded the parapets, and even some of the traverses.

CHAP.
VII.

---

General Khrouleff commanded the foot.

The artillerymen stood to their guns.

II.

Resting upon supports and reserves of great strength, three Divisions of French infantry led respectively by General Mayran on the right, by General Brunet towards the centre, and by General d'Autemarre on the left, were to be simultaneously thrown forward with orders to endeavour to carry not only the Malakoff but all the other works of defence from the Battery of the Point on the east to the Gervais Battery on the west.

Pélissier's
dispositions.

The splendid Division of the Imperial Guard formed Pélissier's great reserve, and was posted in rear of the Victoria Fort at a greatly extended distance from the nearest of the Russian defences. The Chief apparently thought that this distance was not excessive; for, although, when warned on the subject in the course of the previous afternoon, he had consented that two brigades brought up from the west for this purpose should take up an intermediate position in advance of the Imperial Guard, he yet laughed in the face of the

CHAP.
VII. officer who had given the caution, addressing him in his rough, playful way, as ‘Mr Timorous.’ Those two brigades were the forces that received their orders too late, and did not come up in good time.*

From that mishap, it resulted that Péliissier’s original plan of holding back all his reserves on ground widely distant from the enemy’s lines remained practically in force long enough to encounter the test of experience; and, whether the Commander-in-Chief or the gibe-stricken ‘Mr ‘Timorous’ proved to be of those two the more skilled disposer of troops, we shall not be without means of judging.†

To ensure the simultaneous outset of the three attacks, they were all to be launched by one signal, that is, by a bright jet of rockets thrown up at Péliissier’s bidding from a spot that formed nearly the summit of the lofty Victoria Ridge.

Including the great reserve, but not counting the two brigades ordered up from the west, the whole force allotted for the enterprise comprised four Divisions, and was placed, as we have seen, under the orders of General St Jean d’Angély.

III

Post chosen by Lord
Raglan. For his post of observation, Lord Raglan had chosen the Mortar Battery of the 3d Parallel established on the Woronzoff Ridge; and thither CHAP.

* The brigades of Feuchoux and Monteynard. See note, p 152.

† See post, p. 201, and Note.

VII.
(having left all the horses on a less exposed part _____ of the ground) he came on foot with his staff before the break of day.

In the precincts of the French headquarters, Midnight at
the French
headquarters.
men were busied in saddling at midnight; but, whether detained by work, or craving for some moments of sleep that indeed might have done him good service, Pélissier, it seems, did not Pélissier's personal movements. mount until two o'clock in the morning. Considering that his own plans required him to be at the Lancaster Battery before the break of day, and that he could not or would not ride long at a pace beyond that of a walk, the distance to be traversed was such that he ought to have been in his saddle at an earlier hour. This after a while became plain, it seems, even to him; and whilst fretting with natural vexation at the thought of having allowed himself to be behindhand with time, he saw and heard that which might well throw a man of his violent, choleric temperament into frenzies of rage. Not brought about, he well knew, by any word or sign from himself, he all at once saw and heard a fire of great guns and of musketry breaking out from the far eastern wing of the Karabell-naya defences. What he saw and heard before sunrise.

IV.

Observing what was really a shell thrown up from the Mamelon with the trail of light from its General Mayran's premature
attack;

CHAP. fuse that shone out through the still reigning darkness, General Mayran—over-anxious, expectant, with nerves highly strung—imagined that this was the appointed signal for commencing the three French attacks, and—unmoved by the counsels of officers who did not share his mistake—he made haste to lead on—prematurely—the forces placed under his charge.

Having been posted the night before in a part of the Careenage Ravine that seemed apt for his purpose, General Mayran, preceded by Engineers and supported by two battalions of the Voltigeurs of the Guard, was to turn the Point Battery, and enter it by the gorge, to assail and break through the courtine extending from its westerly flank, then abruptly bend off to the left, and (by operating from within the enceinte) lay hold of the Little Redan. It was to assail this courtine from a distance of some 800 yards that a little before three o'clock, General Failly led on his brigade. Met by fire of great power from the ramparts, but also from six steamers anchored off the mouth of the Careenage Ravine, the heads of the columns were broken; but, after a while, Failly rallied them in a fold of the ground, and renewed the attack, pushing forward, this time, to ground no less far in advance than the verge of the 'wolf-pits' there sunk in front of the enemy's works;* but they only achieved this lengthened

* The trou de loup is a pit shaped like the hollow of an inverted extinguisher, and is provided with a stake projecting upwards.

10

Google

Digitized by srujanika@gmail.com

advance at the cost of effecting it under a destructive fire. General Mayran was wounded, then presently wounded again, and the second blow brought him his death. By storms of mitraille and musketry the columns were again driven back, and a like fate befell the fresh troops of not only Saurin's brigade, but also one of the two Voltigeur battalions brought up to renew the attack. Soon, however, under Failly (who had succeeded to Mayran's command) the remains of the Division were rallied on sheltered ground whence they plied the embrasures, and the men on the ramparts with fire.

CHAP.
VII.

His death.

Reputes of
the column.

All this while, the Division engaged looked in vain towards its left for the expected co-operation of Brunet. The premature onset of Mayran had dislocated all the arrangements for securing simultaneous action.

The Commander-in-Chief directed General St Jean d'Angely to support the repulsed troops of Mayran's Division with four battalions of the Guard; but it was not found possible to renew the attack.*

When Pélissier at length reached the post he had chosen, that is, the Right Lancaster Battery, he soon caused his signal to dart up into the air from the lofty Victoria Ridge; and the whirlwind of rage that soon burst on this choleric man may well be imagined; for, whilst still writhing with anger because General Mayran's Division had sprung into premature action, he now suffered

Pélissier
mainly launching his signal.

* Niel, p. 317.

CHAP.
VII. the torment of finding that his own genuine signal produced no result. For the reason already assigned, it was only after some lapse of time that General Brunet could stir; and the original cause of the obstruction was one that also affected the movements of General d'Autemarre.

V.

General
Brunet's
attack;

General Brunet was to attack and break in through the courtine extending from the west flank of the Little Redan, and from the interior position so won force his way into the heart of the Malakoff Work.

His death.

When the troops of General Brunet's Division at length moved out of their trenches, they were met by so mighty a fire of grape and musketry that they disappeared from the eyes of observers under the clouds of dust raised by the missiles directed against them. The heads of the columns were shattered by the falling of men. General Brunet received his death-blow. The foremost part of one column inclined too much to its right, and advanced towards the Little Redan, but the men, it seems, came to a halt when within some 110 yards of the work, and ensconced themselves in a fold of the ground, there awaiting support. The officers did not brook this desistance, and several of them met their deaths in the efforts they made to draw the troops forward.

Another column of the same Division moved straight towards the courtine along a distance of some 330 yards under so hot a fire that it loaded the ground with their dead. Some of the boldest of the men pressing forward beyond the line of the wolf-pits, approached the Ditch of the courtine, where, however—too few to achieve any more—they were crushed by the enemy's fire. Others stopped, seeking shelter from undulations of the ground, or fell back into the stone-quarries which here and there offered cover. The number of men coming back into the trenches there caused great confusion. The officers tried hard to rally and re-form the defeated troops and lead them forward once more to the assistance of the heads of columns; but the enemy's fire proved so unrelenting and strong that the ranks had been hardly re-formed, when again they were stricken and torn.*

Repulse of
the troops

VI.

The advance of the left column was simultaneous with that of the force under Brunet. General d'Autemarre's Division was to descend by the right bank of the Dockyard Ravine, force the lines of defence near the Gervais Battery, and then operating flankwise from within the enceinte to turn, and to carry the Malakoff.

General
d'Autemarre's
attack.

General d'Autemarre at first can have seen no much better prospect before him than the one that had met General Mayran, and afterwards General Brunet; but in war, some blind

* Niel, p. 316.

CHAP. access of chance will often enough interpose to vary the course of events. When the head of General d'Autemarre's column moved down through the Dockyard Ravine, some brief, unexplained inadvertence on the part of the enemy's gunners prevented their using at once the power with which they were armed; and the foremost of the assailing troops being therefore enabled to reach the lines of defence, they not only seized the occasion, but grasped it so boldly, and maintained all they won with so persistent a valour that theirfeat quickly gave a new turn to what a few moments before could hardly have been called an engagement affording to the baffled allies any known and sound basis of hope.

FRENCH
TROOPS
BREAKING
INTO THE FORTRESS;

One of d'Autemarre's Chasseur battalions commanded by Garnier, assailed and broke through the courtine at a part near the foot of the Dockyard Ravine, and pushed on into the Faubourg;* whilst, more to the right, Major Abinal with some eighty of his Engineers under the immediate command of Captain Bressonet, approached the Gervais Battery, found places where unremoved earth interrupted the course of the Ditch, passed over by aid of these heaps, seized, and presently conquered the work, driving out a battalion of the Pultawa regiment, proved able to take some prisoners, and prepared on the arrival CHAP.

* The Chasseurs seem to have been supported in their march by a battalion of the 19th Regiment, but I do not observe any statement showing that that last battalion broke into the Faubourg.

of reinforcements (for which he appealed) to VII.
pursue the adopted design of operating against the Malakoff from within the enceinte.* It is true that the enemy flushed with the success of his resistance elsewhere, relieved from anxiety in the quarters assailed by Mayran and Brunet, and acting under the impulsion of so ardent a commander as Khrouleff, was soon moving troops towards his lost Gervais Battery, and the part of the Karabelnaya which d'Autemarre's light troops had entered: but on the other hand, those valiant French who had broken into the fortress proved resolute no less than bold, the Chasseurs at once making ready to defend house by house the ground they had won in the Faubourg, and the Engineers who had seized the Gervais Battery undertaking with excellent zeal to strengthen their hold of the work. They turned one of its guns against the enemy. By their firmness, these men—the Chasseurs in the Faubourg, and the eighty Engineers in the captured battery—secured ample time at each place for the junction of any fresh troops that d'Autemarre might promptly send down.

This seizure by resolute men of the too swiftly passing occasion was a feat, we can see, of great moment; for—with aid, it is true, at one stage

* Niel, p. 316. This was certainly an extraordinary achievement to be compassed by eighty sappers; but Niel, who commanded the Engineers, has made the statement officially in positive terms, and I cannot (with the knowledge I have) undertake to question its truth.

CHAP. from an interposition of chance—the problem
VII. which asked how assailants could break their way into Sebastopol had now been brilliantly solved.

There remained to be accomplished indeed the vital, the difficult work of reinforcing the victors, and for that purpose moving down soldiery distressingly exposed on their flank to the enemy's guns; but the peril of even this task was of course greatly lightened by what the foremost troops had achieved; for the succouring forces, this time, would face a courtine and a battery no longer bristling with armaments in the hands of their adversaries, but manned by comrades impatient to greet them with outbursts of welcome; and, although in their way towards this goal, they indeed would be running the gauntlet under powerful fire, they at least, under these new conditions, might perform their swift march, or make their yet swifter rush unencumbered with ladders and wool-sacks.

the endeavour to re-inforce them;
this checked. However, the gunners on duty at the eastern face of the Redan were by this time devoting a care to the bulk of d'Autemarre's force which they had not bestowed on the head of his column. On his troops moving down with a mind to support the victorious assailants there poured from the Malakoff and from the eastern face of the Redan a fire so destructive that it not only caused them great losses, but checked their advance. They did not definitively retreat, did not cease to be intent on the purpose of reinforcing their comrades, but moved forward slowly, CHAP.

when moving forward at all; and, if speaking in general terms applicable to a somewhat extended period, one might say that the column hung back.

VIL

The check thus sustained by the bulk of d'Autemarre's Division was seen by the English commander from his place on the Woronzoff Ridge; and having forces in readiness for the attack of that very Redan which was dealing its blows on the French, he could not loyally hesitate to interpose in the action. He indeed had a choice. He might either relieve the French by pouring a crushing fire of great guns on the eastern face of the Redan; or again he might aid them by assaulting the work with his columns of infantry already prepared for the task, and this last, he well knew, was the kind of support that Pélissier yearned to receive.

The bearing of the hindrance encountered by d'Autemarre on Lord Raglan's course of action.

'I always,' wrote Lord Raglan to the Secretary of War, 'guarded myself from being tied down to 'attack at the same moment as the French, and I 'felt that I ought to have some hope of their suc- 'cess before I committed our troops; but, when I 'saw how stoutly they were opposed, I considered 'it was my duty to assist them by attacking my- 'self.'*

Motives tending to govern Lord Raglan's decision.

In the light of the past we can see that Lord

* Private letter to Lord Panmure, 19th June 1855.

CHAP.
VII. Raglan would best have supported the French by acting upon his own military opinion, still therefore pursuing the course which Péliissier, as well as himself, had—until the last evening—chosen, and accordingly expending some two or three hours in the preliminary task of bombardment, with a mind to assault, when the batteries of the Redan should be quelled; but Lord Raglan well knew that nothing short of conformity with Péliissier's new plan—that is, an advance of British infantry—an advance not delayed by first making use of the siege-guns—would pass with the French as affording the loyal support they expected. Sir George Brown and the commander of our Engineers were united in the opinion that our troops should at once move forward. 'Of this,' wrote Lord Raglan, 'I am quite certain, that, if the troops had remained in our trenches the French would have attributed their non-success to our refusal to participate in the operation.'*

It is easy enough to find fault with the painful decision to which Lord Raglan was driven; and indeed, if left free to determine on grounds strictly military, he himself would have flatly condemned it. But no such freedom was his; and, to judge the question with fairness, a critic ought to be armed with not only extended knowledge, but also an imagination so powerful as to be able to apprehend the grave consequences of withholding our infantry at a time when the * Private letter to Lord Panmure, 19th June 1855.

French were undergoing discomfiture and suffering cruel losses. We have been learning again and again that, to meet the full exigencies of modern war, more especially one carried on by allied Powers, a commander must needs be a statesman ; nor, since generals are, after all, men, and sometimes men of noble quality, can they always be rigidly forced in even the business of war, to repress every generous impulse.

CHAP.
VIL

The moment had come when deferring to the mandates of policy, and yielding too, one may own, to the sway of a chivalrous nature, Lord Raglan would surrender his judgment on that purely military question which formed part—yet still only a part—of the more complex question involved.

Under this stress of motives, Lord Raglan deter- His resolve.
mined to accelerate the execution of those plans for using his infantry which down to about nine o'clock on the previous evening had been fixed for a later time, and not only at once to invade the enemy's territory in the direction of the Péressip, but also—and this was the graver resolve—to assail the Redan from a distance of between 400 and 500 yards without having first conquered its fire by duly using his siege-guns.

VIII,

The arrangements contingently made for assaulting the Redan at its salient, and supporting any capture of the work which our troops

Measures for assaulting
the Redan.

CHAP. VII. might effect by a movement (under General Barnard) from the right of the Woronzoff Gorge, were not destined to come into use; so that what we need see in detail of the measures against the Redan includes only the attack by two columns—one directed against its western or (proper) right flank under General Sir John Campbell; the other against its eastern, that is, its (proper) left flank, and commanded by Colonel Yea.*

Sir George Brown in the immediate command,

but Lord Raglan present in person.

Sir George Brown had been placed in the immediate command of our troops set apart to attack the Redan; but Lord Raglan—not being called off to any other part of the field—was destined to be watching the conflict with his own practised eyes. From the first to the last of the combat before the Redan, we shall see him in the line of the fire directed on Colonel Yea's column.

IX.

The column led by Campbell.

The column entrusted to Campbell drew its troops from the 4th Division, and the several components of the force were to move in this order:—

A covering party of 100 Riflemen extended in open line;

Twelve Engineers bringing with them their implements, and various warlike appliances;

* Acting as a Brigadier. For some time Colonel Yea had commanded the First Brigade of the Light Division.

Fifty soldiers carrying wool-bags;*

CHAP.
VII.

Sixty soldiers and sixty sailors bearing, all of them, ladders;

The 'main column' or 'storming party' with a strength of 400 men drawn from the 57th Regiment.

Thus, besides its attendant Engineers and bearers of wool bags and ladders, the force comprised 500 bayonets.

The 'reserve,' under Colonel Lord West, drew its men from the 21st Fusiliers and the 17th Regiment, and had a strength of 800.

The commander, General Sir John Campbell, placed himself at the head of his 'main column,' or 'storming party,' and directed that the so-called reserve should follow in close support.

The Engineer officer trusted to pilot the column was Lieutenant Murray, and the one at the head of the 'ladder-party' was he of whose growing fame we spoke in an earlier page —the then young lieutenant, now General Sir Gerald Graham.

Supposing the Great Redan and its neighbouring batteries to be still in the crushed, silenced state to which our great guns had reduced them on the previous evening, the bulk of the column thus organised might perhaps have been able to traverse the interval of 470 yards which divided it from the object of attack without ceasing at the end of the march to be a highly fit instrument for carrying the western flank of the Great Redan

No means enabling the column to reach its chosen point of attack.

* For filling the ditch.

CHAP. by escalade and assault; but under existing conditions, the climbing, the fighting, the conquering efforts required formed, after all, only a sequel to the heaviest part of the ordeal; for not even the straitening shortness of a midsummer night had shorn the besieged of their power to retrieve, under cover of darkness, the havoc on havoc inflicted by a great cannonade. When the enemy had made good his repairs, the plan of attack as transformed by Péliſſier's abrupt change of counsel could afford no solution at all of the now foremost problem which asked how a body of troops in full daylight, and moving besides very slowly — because encumbered with ladders — could traverse without being shattered 470 yards of open ground beneath the unassuaged fire of not only the Great Redan, but also all the other strong batteries that guarded this approach to the Faubourg.

Advance of the covering party, the Engineers, and the bearers;

*Not out of the 'main
' column.'*

The fire encountered.

However, before break of day, the components of Sir John Campbell's force had assembled under the parapet on the western side of the 'Quarries'; and, when afterwards the concerted signal was given by a flag three times waved towards their right, the hundred Riflemen followed by the Engineers, and the sack and ladder parties, but not, as had been planned, by the 'main column,' began to move forward under the storm of grape-shot and musketry-fire that presently opened upon them from the western face of the Redan, as well as from the Barrack

Battery, and this with a force unimpaired by the CHAP.
bombardment of the previous day. With before them Sebastopol in all its strength at a distance nowhere less than 400 yards, and trained to take advantage of ground, the Rifles getting together hung back for a while under such little shelter as was afforded by the westward slope of the spur.* Thence they plied the Redan with a fire that seemed to produce no effect. Of course this halt of the Rifles forced Murray also to halt with his few Engineers; but Graham had still work to do in bringing up his wool-sack and ladder parties. The ladder party.
Already he had lost several men. It was found that the soldier—foot soldier—seemed averse more or less from the service of carrying burthens across a vast space under torrents of fire without having his hand on the weapon—the weapon beloved and trusted—which in fights of the kind he is most accustomed to contemplate forms almost a part of himself; but the sailors proved dauntless.
Gerald
Graham
and the sailors.
The vast stature of the young Engineer who directed their energies made him strangely conspicuous in the field, and it was on Gerald Graham and the sailors that the praises of observers converged.

Murray at this time was mortally wounded, and the command of the Engineers devolved upon Murray mortally wounded. Graham.

Then the brave, the hot-tempered Colonel Tyl-

* The distance of 400 yards was from the Quarries to the salient of the Redan. The distance from its re-entering angle—the chosen point of attack—was 470 yards.

CHAP.
VII.Intensity
of Colonel Tylden,resulting heat above 6 were the subject of the Report.Intensity of the fire
as observed by Tylden:who was quickly seen dead.Course taken by Gerald
Graham.

den (whom so often we have seen night and day in the thick of the siege fights) came up impatiently fretting at the check he had observed, and saying, 'What are you stopping for? On, 'men, on! forward!' he shouted, waving his sword over his head. Graham ran up to him and asked, if, the attack on the flank of the work being impracticable, he should lead his men on the salient. The Colonel said:—' Anywhere, so long as you get on,' and again he began to cheer on the men then moving towards the salient. If any conjoined band of men had come up alongside him, it must needs have encountered a fate scarce short of what one calls massacre; for, to use the eyes, any moment, was to see the ground ripped up and torn by missiles descending in swarms; and so thick came the flight of the grape-shots that together whilst rushing, and hissing in storm through the air, they gave out mighty crashes of sound not oftentimes heard by mortals who have lived to speak of such trials. As might well be expected, Colonel Tylden was quickly struck down, and indeed so cruelly wounded, that he never again would be able to resume the valiant part he had taken in the siege of Sebastopol.

First devoting some moments of care to the honoured chief thus lying wounded, Gerald Graham hurried after his men and drew up his ladders on ground he chose for the purpose. This he did by the aid of only the sailors and a few sappers; for of the 120 soldiers who had been carrying wool-bags and ladders, there were CHAP.

then few or none to be seen. VII.

Gerald Graham with his sappers and sailors, and the ladders they had borne, remained for some time in advance of our trenches; but the covering party of Rifles had already disappeared from his front, nor again, if he looked to his rear, could he see 'the main column' approaching. Where the Rifles and the 'main column' were we shall by-and-by see; but their absence from this part of the field annulled of course for the time any prospect of thence undertaking an onslaught against the Redan. What Graham had with him in readiness for any assault were only the mechanical implements, and not the armed forces required.

He therefore withdrew what remained of his valiant sailors and sappers from their position outside, and wisely brought them all back to await their next opportunity beneath the sheltering parapet.

What had separated the infantry from the bearers, and stopped the intended attack, will now be seen.

At the outset of the advance we saw made by the 'covering party' and 'bearers,' the 'main column' under General Campbell in person was duly preparing to follow in the wake of the ladder-men, and already indeed its officers were, some of them, over the parapet, when the rest of the body was stopped and even

CHAP.
VIL turned from its course by an unforeseen kind of obstacle.

The obstruction diverting it from the assigned course

Course
taken by the column;

its actual and relative position
when emerging.

What arrested the column was a throng of English soldiery belonging to various regiments, and even to several Divisions who, although not on duty, were nevertheless so eager to take part in the attack that they had stolen away from their camps to this part of the 'Quarries,' and now crowded in on the trenches with a weight that intercepted the column and prevented its clearing the parapet. Thus obstructed the men of the 57th (who formed the 'main column') filed off to their left, moved westward until they had come to the end of the unfinished parapet, then abandoned the shelter, and confronted the fire that was instantly awakened against them from not only the whole western face of the Great Redan, but also from the guns further west that guarded its re-entering angle—the guns of the Artakoff Battery.*

The column, when thus it emerged, was far removed from the ground that it needs must have traversed if advancing, as directed by orders, in the wake of the ladder-party; and accordingly we see that the troops meant to form a single body united under General Campbell were in a dissevered state.

Evolving themselves as they were from the thin trailing column in which they had marched along the sheltered side of the parapet, and then all at once facing the open, and confronting great

* Colonel Warre, MS.

batteries, the 400 men of what was called the 'main column' began to undergo a hard trial. For any attempt at formation they needed some little time. They besides needed firm and swift guidance not only in order to face the trying conditions to which we now see them exposed, but also to determine their course; for on the one hand men looked towards the re-entering angle of the Redan which was understood to be their true goal, yet at this time it seemed that the Rifles and ladder-party were operating towards its salient.*

The decision was one to be taken at a critical moment, and under a converging fire of grape-shot and musketry that seemed to threaten destruction.

When the young Engineer Gerald Graham reported himself on that morning to the chief now commanding this column in person, he had found General Campbell so glowing with that warlike ardour that comes with the blood of the Scots as to be almost impatient of thoughts concerning the 'how,' and the 'where,' and the 'when' he could most fitly strike at the foe, and he even in his usual gay vein spoke joyous words which imported that he 'understood the fighting part best.' But in face of the Great Redan, with its batteries brought once again to a perfect state of repair, and at a distance of 400 yards from the nearest part of its counterscarp, the pastime of 'fighting' was one that the enemy's great Engineer did not

Campbell's
previous words to Graham.

His vain expectation of a fight.

* See ante, p. 172.

CHAP.
VIITodleben's policy.

mean to allow. It was mainly to ward off all fighting of the hand-to-hand sort that he plied his great Art. He might, and he would cause his adversaries to die, or fall wounded, but not under those conditions of reciprocal action which men call a 'fight.' On the contrary, he would strike down assailants with his favourite resource of 'mitrail' before they could come to close quarters.

General
Campbell killed.

General Campbell was very soon killed. His authority devolved on Lord West (then on duty at the head of the reserve), and the next in command on the spot was Colonel Shadforth, the chief of the 57th men. At nearly the same time, however, Colonel Shadforth was killed; and this simultaneous loss of not only the chief but also of him who—at least on the spot—had stood the next in command was of course such an accident as—if not even causing discouragement of a serious kind—might well break asunder the thread of any settled design which till then had been guiding the troops.

Courses that might be taken by the 57th men.

These men of the proud 57th might soon find death under the fire that began to be greeting them from the moment when, turning the parapet, they emerged on the open ground; but, to satisfy the exigency of their great Albuera tradition, they needed to be at close quarters with an enemy so as not to be dying like saints, but rather fighting like men;* and, approachable as it was

* An allusion to the famous command 'Fifty-seventh! die hard' which was addressed to the regiment at Albuera by

by low ground not altogether unsheltered, whilst also guilty, they knew, of assailing them with its heavy cross-fire, the Artakoff Battery seemed to be the sort of foe they might challenge. The position of the work too was such that, to attack it would be virtually to attack the Redan at that same re-entering angle which, as people understood, was the goal pointed out by authority. Troops acting in the contemplated direction would be able to avoid the Abattis by turning its flank.

CHAP.
VII.

The Artakoff Battery.

These men of the 57th, however, had not yet taken their course when they all at once found themselves joined by another small body of men.

The covering party of Riflemen who had led the advance became aware before long that they were not supported by troops in their immediate rear, but afterwards on ground further west perceived the 'main column' emerging from below the end of the parapet, and with this force determined to act. They came, and formed up alongside of the bulk of the 57th men, now also joined by soldiers from other regiments, who perhaps were the lawless intruders of whom we before had to speak. Having with them their new chief Colonel Warre and also Major Inglis, the men of the 57th and the other troops now acting with them advanced against the Artakoff Battery; and

The Rife-men quitting their ground;

and forming up with some men of the main column and others.

The united force moving against the Artakoff Battery.

its chief, Colonel Inglis. It was in elucidation of young Stanley's apostrophe to the regiment at Inkermann when he said: 'Men! remember Albuera,' that I once before referred to the long-cherished words. Ante, vol. vi. p. 305.

CHAP.
VII. —within thirty yards of its Ditch*—established themselves upon ground which offered something like shelter to men lying down.†

Their subsequent
course.

To use the position thus gained by a handful of men as a stepping-stone for the seizure of the battery, Colonel Warre would of course be in need of additional troops; and, none as yet having come up, he sent back Major Inglis to ask for reinforcements;‡ but meanwhile held fast to the ground he had won, and thence, as before, went on firing into the battery.

When afterwards Colonel Warre learnt that he must not expect reinforcements, he reluctantly withdrew his small force from the vantage-ground it had won, and effected the retrograde movement in an orderly way with a loss of only three men.§

Lord West
acceding to the command.

When apprised of his accession to the command, Lord West was not cognisant of the advance of the Rifles and the 57th men on the Artakoff Battery; and nowhere discerning those * 'Within twenty or thirty yards.' Colonel Warre, ante.

† Major, now General Inglis, who at Inkerman, when young Stanley fell, succeeded to the command of the regiment and brought it out of action. I now know with certainty that General Inglis is the son of the Colonel Inglis who at Albuera addressed to the regiment his immortal apostrophe.

‡ Whether the application was addressed to General Bentinck (who commanded the 4th Division) or to Sir G. Brown, Colonel Warre does not say.

§ From 'They came,' ante, p. 177, down to this point, my statement closely follows the Report of Colonel Warre to General Bentinck.

troops, he apparently thought that the fire—the merciless fire—they encountered when facing the open had altogether destroyed or dispersed them.

All the organised force that he knew of was, first what remained of the valiant body of sailors with their ladders which along with a few of the sappers remained under Graham's command, and next, a string of several hundreds of infantry (composed of what was called the 'Reserve' and of stragglers from other bodies) which, to use the chief's words, had 'deployed, as it were, into an 'extended line behind the parapet seeking cover 'from the furious fire wherever it could be found, 'and disorder and confusion prevailed.'*

Lord West perhaps in cool blood would hardly have judged that the power—the severed, the decomposed power—which chance had thrown into his hands was such as could make it his duty to protract an abortive attempt, still less to begin a new onset with plainly inadequate means.

It was natural, however, that one who could act with the vigour and zeal we saw him exerting at Inkerman should resist a conclusion importing that the moment of his accession to extended command must be the very one to be chosen for giving up all further effort. A covering party, he thought, might again be formed and thrown forward, to be followed again by the ladder-men, whilst he himself in their wake would bring up the body of troops then sheltering under the para-

CHAP.
VII.

The resources at his disposal

His reluctance to believe that he was powerless to execute an attack.

* Lord West to the author, Dec. 23d, 1863.

CHAP. VII. pet, and strive to push home an attack on the flank of the Great Redan.

His direction to Gerald Graham.

State and strength of the 'ladder-party.'

Lord West accordingly saying that he meant to throw forward a fresh line of skirmishers requested Gerald Graham to take out his ladders once more. For this task such of the sailors as had not been killed or disabled stood, all of them, ready and eager; but the soldiers who had constituted one-half of the 'ladder-party' were no longer to be seen in their places. Lord West strove to make good this void by assigning for the task other soldiers; and his efforts were not all in vain. Still, Graham found on the whole that he could only muster four bearers for each of his ladders instead of the right number—six.

The ladder-party under Graham.

The promised covering party had not been thrown forward when Graham nevertheless brought his ladders out over the parapet, and at once met the fire reopened on him and his people from the batteries of the Great Redan. With their ladders beside them, our men lay down on the grass, and there—although still sought and found by too many of the enemy's missiles—awaited the promised advance of the men charged to cover their front.

When after a while it was seen that the 'covering party' of skirmishers had not begun to advance, the sailors eagerly wished—making only an exception for Graham—to dispense with the aid of all soldiers. They had lost their naval commanders (Lieutenant Kidd killed, and Lieutenant Cave gravely wounded), but Mr Kennedy, mate, still remained to them ; and—delighted with their pilot Gerald Graham—a giant intent on his work as though proof against grape-shot and fear—they wanted, if he would but lead them, to go and attack the Redan without asking any one other landsman to share in the bliss of the enterprise. Their 'pilot' of course could not humour them in this wild desire; and on the contrary he soon brought them back to find shelter under the parapet. There, he kept them together in readiness for any renewed advance that Lord West might think fit to direct.

CHAP.
VII.

It was for his service with the 'ladder-party' in this, and in the earlier part of the day that Gerald Graham received the high honour of the Victoria Cross. This honour was awarded to Graham for what the royal warrant described as his 'determined gallantry at the head of a 'ladder-party,' and the words, unless I mistake, are blended by him in his memory with the heroism of the sailors who shared his labours and perils.

The administration and approval bestowed on Graham and the sailors.

'I wish,' wrote Lord West, 'I wish I could do justice to the daring and intrepid conduct of the party of sailors. . . . Lieutenant Graham of the Engineers who led the ladder-party evinced a coolness and a readiness to expose himself to any personal risk which does him the greatest credit.'

Lord West, however, meanwhile was far from having the means out of which he could form a

The sole means at Lord West's disposal.

* Lord West to Lieutenant-General Bentinck, ubi ante.

CHAP. new column with any semblance of power to VII. go and attack the Redan. The body of men we saw acting against the Artakoff Battery was not by him known to be anywhere gathered;
 and of troops acting under his orders there simply were none, except the string of mixed soldiery we saw sheltered under the parapet,—an unorganised gathering of men not either so placed, or so cir-cumstanced in other respects that they could be wielded like a battalion drawn up on open ground by any magic words of command. Nor to these could Lord West really offer the sometimes alluring temptation of what our people mean by a ‘fight’; for the men knew by this time that, if once over the parapet, they would still be divided from their adversaries by a zone of open ground—several hundreds of yards in breadth which they could not even hope to be crossing except under torrents of grape-shot that needs must shut out every prospect of closing with the distant enemy, or even drawing near to his counterscarp.

His vain
efforts.

Still, when applying his energies to this or that given part of the distended line, Lord West, nobly seconded by his officers no less than by the spirit of the men, proved here and there able to get men out over the parapet; and he judged that, if this friendly barrier had been levelled beforehand along a good part of its course, he perhaps would have found himself able to lead out his troops in a body through the gap so laid open, and to execute what at the least might have proved to be a bold 'rush' on the flank of the Great Redan; but, as it was, though engaging his people by fractions in forward movements, he could not make their spring simultaneous—could not bring them to be climbing the parapet—climbing over from Life to Death—at one and the same time.*

After consulting with Colonel Cole of the 17th Regiment, Lord West sent an officer to Sir George Brown with directions to ask for orders, and for fresh troops.

Brown's answer directed Lord West to re-form the attacking column, and not without further instructions to make any fresh advance.

In a pencil-written note, Lord West replied to Sir George, informing him that any attempt to re-form the column would be hopeless, and earnestly begging for fresh troops in order to renew the attack.

Sir George Brown told the messenger that to this last note from Lord West there was no answer.

Thus ended the abortive endeavour to push an attack against the west flank of the Redan.

From the moment when it appeared that—in even one brief summer night—the enemy's batteries had recovered their broken strength, there

The accidents which marred the advance of
the column

* Science recognises the difficulty of executing a simultaneous advance of troops under such conditions, and recommends the 'Coupure blindée,' the expedient adverted to by Lord West.

CHAP.
VII.

saved our troops from great miseries.

was seemingly no ground for hoping that the column entrusted to Campbell would ever traverse the space that divided the Quarries from the counterscarp of the Great Redan without undergoing such slaughter as must either destroy the force utterly, or at all events render it powerless—at the end of the long bloody march—to undertake an assault; and it was fortunate for our people that accidents arrested the course of the enterprise in so early a stage, as to save them from the consequences of becoming more deeply committed.

Losses.

There is no such dissection of the Returns as would enable one to give the numbers of the sailors and Royal Engineers who fell whilst making this effort against the western flank of the Redan; but in killed, wounded, and missing, that Division (the 4th) which had furnished all the rest of the strength lost 193 altogether, of whom 16 were officers, including one major-general, that is, as we saw, Sir John Campbell.

X.

An impatient Lieutenant of Supplies;

Amongst those of the Royal Engineers who found themselves kept in reserve near this part of the field there was one young lieutenant who painfully, bitterly chafed at what he thought the hard lot of being withheld from the action; and, when hearing that—at least for a time—the vain onset we witnessed had ceased, he not only assumed that our people were going to renew the engagement, but also made sure that—because succeeding to Murray, or rather to Murray's successor—he now at last would be summoned to take a part in the enterprise. He therefore eagerly sought to know what was the duty awaiting him, and addressed his question to Graham, then newly come out of action. Graham answered somewhat lightly—in words which imported that the engagement had ceased, and that there was nothing for the enquirer to do. Thereupon, the young lion was wrought into a phrenzy of disappointment and rage, the rage indeed being so hot that there followed something like an estrangement between the two friends. This impassioned lieutenant of Sappers was a soldier marked out for strange destinies, no other than Gordon—Charles Gordon—then ripening into a hero sublimely careless of self, and a warrior-saint of the kind that Moslems—rather than Christians are fondly expecting from God.

allusion
to his subsequent
career.

XI

Before daylight, the troops set apart for assaulting the Redan on its eastern flank were collected in those lines of trench-work which, till wrested from the enemy on the 7th of June, had formed the counter-approaches established on his left of the 'Quarries'; and the same triple wave of a flag that unleashed, as we saw, Campbell's force on the west of the Redan was also the recognised

Troops assembled and launched for attack on the eastern flank of the

C H A P. signal which threw forward Colonel Yea's column
VII. against the eastern flank of the work.

Composition and number of forces under Yea.

*Strength of
the column
moving with him.*

*Advance of
the column.*

With—foremost of all—its 'covering party' of 100 Riflemen in open order; with next its 12 Engineers, followed by some 180 soldiers and sailors bearing wool-sacks and ladders; with next again the 'main body,' or 'storming party,' of 400 men drawn from the 34th Regiment; and with finally, though held back at first, its 'reserve' of 800 men, furnished by the 7th or Royal Fusiliers and by the 33d Regiment,—this column entrusted to Colonel Yea was almost exactly a counterpart of the one we saw led by General Campbell on the opposite flank, comprising therefore a strength of 1300 bayonets, and, in all, nearly 1500 men.* But Colonel Yea did not direct (as did General Campbell elsewhere) that the so-called 'reserve' should come up at once in close support to the storming column, and accordingly the whole of the infantry yet empowered to move with the chief comprised only 500 bayonets.

The piloting Engineer officer was Lieutenant A'Court Fisher, and Lieutenant Graves headed the ladder-party. When the signal was given, the 100 Riflemen from the foremost trench and the rest of the force from the other trench in its rear sprang swiftly over the parapets, and then at once fairly confronted that part of the Sebastopol defences which was formed by the eastern face and flank of the Great Redan, by the chain of works thence trending northwards, and again by those further east extending home to the Mala- CHAP.

* Viz., with the 12 Engineers and 180 bearers, 1492.

koff. VII.

These works, as already we know, had been restored under cover of darkness to the giant strength they could wield before the opening of the bombardment, and were not only amply garrisoned by artillerymen and bodies of infantry, but also put on the alert by the French attacks further east.

So, the moment our men showed their heads above the two parapets, they were greeted by a storm of mitrail that seemed more than searching enough to prevent even Fortune herself from cleaving a way for her favourites betwixt the paths of the grape-shot. Yet, although many fell, the men remaining unstricken did not cease to advance—to advance, one may say, on Sebastopol, for what our people, this time, assailed (by an onset they strove to maintain across an unsheltered zone of from four to five hundred yards in breadth) was—not (as on the 7th of June) a mere outwork, or counter-approach, but—the glorious fortress itself, fully armed, fully manned, and expectant. It chanced that Lord Raglan—a veteran in war, and accustomed to measure his words—was all the while standing himself in the line of that torrent of fire that greeted Colonel Yea's column, and he wrote of it thus: 'I never 'had a conception before of such a shower of 'grape as they poured upon us from the Russian
'works. Some of them must have been thrown 'from very heavy guns.'* But great as it seemed * To Lord Panmure, Private Letter, 19th June 1855. The

The works it confronted.

The fire incurred by this column.

CHAP. VII. from the first, this crushing fire of artillery was about to be now reinforced by another arm of the service. Our string of 100 Riflemen thrown out in front had been formed as a 'covering party,' which, if only the anterior bombardment had not been omitted in deference to General Pélissier, might perhaps have kept down any fire attempted from what in such case would have hardly been more than the ruins of Todleben's Great Redan. As it was, our foremost hundred of men, advancing under daylight across open ground on a fortress at the height of its power, were quickly mown down in great numbers, and, the unwounded survivors still continuing their forward movement, still keeping their place in the front, became rather what we mean when we speak of a 'forlorn hope' than a 'covering party' endowed with anything like a real power to keep down or check the fire of either the mighty guns which were hurling torrents of grape-shot on the advancing troops, or even that of the infantry industriously driving their missiles from over the top of the parapet.

These blasts of mitraille, reinforced by the rifle and musketry, met the very ideal of Todleben; for his fixed belief was, as we know, that a fortress whilst girded by fire of this enormous power must be proof against any assault undertaken across a broad zone.

For any mortal advancing in the teeth of the extraordinary intensity of the fire is described in not less strong terms by Sir George Brown and by Admiral Lushington.

storm it was hard to see how it could happen CHAP.
that, unless by some mystic protection, he still VIL might remain alive; for the air all around him was boisterous with the rushing flight of war missiles, whilst the ground in his front did not cease to throb under the impact of grape-shot, and the lighter touch of the bullets that came thickly patterning down to swell the leaden torrent. A man moving steadily forward under a fire of this kind when only in quest of the means by which to begin a fair fight, and unheated as yet by the rapture of striking at him who strikes may loftily use his sheer reason, and tell himself that the moment is one fit enough, after all, for that assured meeting with death which can never be finally shunned; or perhaps he may find it more simple to suspend for a while the dominion of his reasoning faculty, and borrow a lesson from beings which rather are governed by temperament. Some, for instance, moved forward, head down, and 'butted,' as though in hot wrath, at the storm of iron and lead.

A time at last came when what remained of the covering party made good its advance to the verge of the Abattis—an outwork of sharpened branches which covered the Redan at a distance of some 80 yards from its front.

The natural irregularities of the ground in this part of the field, and the hollows dug out by the impact and explosion of shells, gave here and there some little shelter to any survivor of the covering party, if lying down closely, and ensconced

The remains of the Riflemen coming up to the Abattis;

and clinging to the ground they had won;

CHAP.
VII.under a searching fire.

ing himself within the limit of the partial cover thus formed. But, standing up on the top of the parapet with a boldness that our people admired, Russian infantry quickly saw down into all the slight hollows, and searched each with a power not only increased, but increasing; so that what little shelter there had been became less and less every minute.

'The Engineer officer' at the Abattis.

The commanding Engineer, A'Court Fisher, had come unscathed through the fire, and being now close to the Abattis he knew of course that in virtue of his position as commanding Engineer, he might have to give counsel. He found that on being examined, the Abattis showed scarce a sign of having been damaged at all by the yesterday's bombardment, and also saw plainly that no such engineering operation as that of opening the work by grapnels was feasible under the torrent of grape-shot and musketry-fire pouring down from the Great Redan; but on the other hand he found here and there in the work some gaps, or rather weak places through which men might push their way.

The state of the 'ladder-
'party.'

His next thought turned to the ladders. Of these not one could be seen in course of being brought up. They were, all of them, lying on the ground, some close to the Abattis, others less far advanced. There were some that had no bearers near them. Others had at their sides men sitting or lying on the ground, and towards one of these ladders—a ladder manned by sailors—A'Court Fisher made his way. Accosting one of the three sailors he found either sitting or lying down near the ladder, he said, 'Come along, CHAP.

VII.' Jack, let us have that ladder to the front,' and then learnt that those who had carried it were, all of them, men killed or wounded. The rest of the sailors' division was in similar plight, there remaining not even one ladder with bearers still able to carry it.

A'Court Fisher, though only a lieutenant in rank, being nevertheless, as we know, the commanding Engineer with this force, was entitled, was even required, to consult at fit times with the Chief. And the Chief was approaching. At the head of what remained of his storming party, Duty of the 'Engineer
officer.' Approach of Colonel
Yea, Colonel Yea—sword in hand came up to the verge of the Abattis; and, addressing him, is accosted, but killed A'Court Fisher said: 'I am the Engineer officer, sir; shall I advance?' * In the moment that followed, Yea fell backwards shot dead.

Accosting Captain Jesse of his own—the Engineer—corps, A'Court Fisher said: 'Well, Jesse, Captain Jesse, too, accosted
and killed. what's to be done?' Before Jesse could answer, he staggered under a shot received in the head and was killed.† Then, to several others successively A'Court Fisher spoke; but—as though his charmed life had been given him on some fell

* Meaning of course, 'Shall the Engineers make what arrangements they can for the advance of the column?'

† Captain Jesse was not originally on duty with the Engineers in this part of the field, but he 'left the general officer to whom he was attached to see himself that the orders given were carried out.'—The Commanding Engineer to Lord Raglan, June 19, 1855.

CHAP.
VII.

A like fatality overtaking
others.

Order given by the 'Engineer officer'

What to expect from the despatch of fresh
troops.

condition importing that all he accosted must die—it so happened that those he addressed were stricken, one after another, before they could answer his words.

A Court Fisher made an endeavour to collect the troops, but they proved to be so few in number—scarce exceeding, he thought, 150 (<sup>1</sup>)—as to be disqualified—until reinforced—for any assault on Sebastopol; and, in expectation of a time when fresh troops would come up in support, he ordered the men to do what we saw done before by the scant remains of the covering party, that is, to get under such cover as could be gained by lying down and ensconcing themselves within the slight hollows that here and there marked the ground on the outer side of the Abattis. In his efforts thus firmly maintained under raging fire, 'the Engineer officer' was aided by the exceeding zeal and valour of Sergeant Landrey, one of his sappers,

Our few men, lying down on the verge of the Abattis, and under a mighty fire delivered now at a range of only some 80 yards, might well enough yearn to be told that supports were at last coming up; but the actual conditions were such—our ladders having all 'stranded'—that a large despatch of fresh troops pushed forward through storms of mitrail must have hugely augmented the sacrifices already made by our people without opening, perhaps after all, any clear, or even dim prospect of seizing the Great Redan.

Be that as it may, no fresh troops could be seen coming up; and any officer acting in command of the men here engaged might well have felt it his duty—his bounden, his sacred duty—to save them from the ugly alternative of either perishing uselessly, or lapsing into retreat without an order to warrant it; but who, since the fall of its chief, was entitled to withdraw the small force?

CHAP.
VII.

The duty of an officer in command.

For want of the needed command our people remained lying down under a powerful fire that—despite the half shelter they had gained—was steadily thinning their line.

But on whom had the command devolved?

The 'Engineer officer' happily had preserved a cool head; and as a first step towards useful action, he sought to learn who was entitled—or rather perhaps who was bound under painfully adverse conditions—to take up the vacant command. He strove to see or hear of some still undischarged officer with at lowest the rank of a captain, but finding none such, whilst also remembering that he was of higher standing than any subaltern of the line, he reluctantly found himself driven to a painful conclusion—one importing no less than that he—he himself—though only a lieutenant, must be the senior officer present; and, once forced to see this, he did not delay the accomplishment of what, however distasteful was still a clearly marked duty. He called out to our men: 'Retire into the trenches the best way you can.'

A Court of Inquiry;
the course
he took.

The troops then began to withdraw, and—all the way under a fire that still exacted its victims—fell back on our most advanced trenches.

Withdrawal of the remainder of the troops.

CHAR.
VII.

In the course of the retreat, A'Court Fisher himself, and many of the people obeying him, laid hold of yet one more occasion for the exercise of their daring and firmness by toiling protractedly—toiling under strong fire—in order to save wounded men.

Just praise bestowed by the authorities on A'Court Fisher.

Lieutenant A'Court Fisher's chief reported him as one who had 'displayed great coolness, judgment, and decision under very trying circumstances.'*

The loss of Colonel Yea;

When, after the peace that had lasted scarce less than forty years, our new generation of islanders took up 'the great tradition,' we saw Colonel Yea on the Alma at the head of his Royal Fusiliers; but also we afterwards saw him encountering the stress of 'the winter troubles' with a rare force of will that protected his cherished regiment from no small share of the hardship endured by other troops; and to his power so exerted, no less than to his 'gallantry' in action, Lord Raglan in terms referred when—in sorrow—announcing to England the loss of this resolute chief.†

In their choice of the moment ordained for the end of his life whilst advancing at the head of his stormers, and already on the verge of the Abattis, the Fates, one may say, proved kind. He was still in the pride of attack, yet so closely approaching misfortune as almost to touch its brink. Any answer from him to the question of the piloting Engineer must needs have been either one owning his persistent attack to be hopeless, or else an answer enjoining some wild, frantic act of the kind that is rather sacrificial than warlike. Opportune, under such conditions, may have well been the shot which, before he could open his lips, laid on him the silence of death.

* General Harry Jones to Lord Raglan, 20th June 1855.

† Lord Raglan to Secretary of State, 19th June 1855. A published Despatch.

Except as regards the storm column (from which clear duty compelled him to exact heavy sacrifice) Colonel Yea had been chary of the lives of his men; for, though holding an extended authority, he did not direct that the bulk of the troops he commanded should come up—encountering slaughter—in close support to the lesser body of men with which he acted in person. In that smaller body, however, as may well be supposed, the proportion of loss was huge. Irrespective of the Engineers and the sailors, our infantry sharing with Yea in his onset against the Redan on its eastern or (proper) left flank lost no less than fourteen of their officers, and more than three-fifths of their strength;* whilst there also unhappily fell a distressingly large proportion of the few Engineers and of the sixty seamen who and of other officers and

of men.

* Out of the 100 men furnished by the Rifle Brigade and the 400 by the 34th Regiment, making together 500 bayonets with besides some soldiers acting as bearers, there fell 313 either wounded or killed.

CHAP.
VII.

had taken part in the enterprise. Of these other losses no separate return is before me; but we know that of the three Engineer officers engaged in this part of the field, one only, that is, A'Court Fisher, came out of the action alive; and that of the six naval officers there engaged with the ladder division, no less than five were struck down.

It was at an early moment that Captain Peel, the commander of the sailors, the heroic, the radiant Peel received the wound which disabled him.

Advance and subsequent retreat of the supports.

Whilst (before they had been ordered to retire) the scanty remains of the 'covering party' and of the 'storming column' were still confronting Sebastopol, the supports, though unseen by our people then lying down, as we saw, on the verge of the Abattis, had already begun to advance. Colonel Lysons commanded these troops. The 400 men of the 7th or Royal Fusiliers moved the foremost in open column of companies, and were followed by a like number drawn from the 33d Regiment. The blasts of mitrail and of musketry pouring down from the Great Redan soon destroyed the formation of the Royal Fusiliers, but did not arrest their advance, though converting it nevertheless into a fierce onward rush. 'The fire,' writes one of their officers—the able and brave Colonel Hibbert—'was so tremendous, 'one could only put one's head down, and run on 'as fast as possible.'*

* Colonel Hibbert to Mr Kinglake, November 28, 1869.

The supporting force under this trial maintained its advance until the remains of our troops engaged near the Abattis were seen to be at last falling back. The supports then began to retire, but already they had suffered, and still were suffering loss.

CHAP.
VII.

XII.

Of that fire from the Great Redan which Colonel Yea's column provoked, no small part found its way to our trenches occasioning losses of men; and especially it poured on the Mortar Battery of the 3d Parallel, where Lord Raglan had taken his stand. There, leaning over the parapet in order to see all he could of the English attack, and of the general tenor of the French operations against the Malakoff and the Gervais Battery, Lord Raglan kept at his side the commander of our Engineers (General Harry Jones), but directed that all the rest of his staff and the orderlies with them should sit down, obtaining all the shelter that was possible, and take care not to attract the enemy's attention by looking over the parapet.

Yea's column had not long moved forward when the general commanding our Engineers was torn from the side of Lord Raglan by a grape-shot striking his forehead; (<sup>2</sup>) and from time to time afterwards, when officers and men bringing messages or having other business in hand came up from different parts of the field and stood upright in the battery, they were, some

His commanding Engineer torn from his side.

C H A P.
V I L.Others
stricken.The continuous
measures.

of them, wounded, some killed. Though incessantly watching the combat from over the parapet, Lord Raglan himself was not struck.

The conditions did not prove to be such that any attack on the salient of the Great Redan could at this time be usefully made; and, no change in this respect happening at a later hour, it resulted of course that the measure was not carried into effect.

General Barnard's ulterior operations had always been meant to depend on the fate of the attacks directed against the Redan. His troops therefore were stayed in the advanced position they had won on the right of the Woronzoff Gorge, and were afterwards duly withdrawn.*

XIII.

The bombardment ordered by Lord
Raglan;

When the onsets of his infantry against the Redan had come at last to a close, Lord Raglan caused his siege-batteries to exert their full power against both the Redan and the Malakoff, thus not only making it certain that the enemy's glad sense of relief from attacks of foot-soldiers would be followed within some five minutes by the trial of suffering bombardment amid scenes of havoc and slaughter, but also tearing open the way for any renewed assault he might afterwards choose to deliver.

Its effect.

This bombardment proved so effective that * General Barnard to Sir Richard England, 18th June 1855.

after scarce more than three-quarters of an hour CHAP.
the batteries it assailed were all but silenced. VII.

Yet, to mark the ascendant thus swiftly obtained by our gunners was under one aspect distressing; for how could our people help thinking of what might have been the result, if, the right order of operations—the order which placed bombardment first, and next, assaults by our infantry—had not been reversed in the way we observed by the exigencies of what we called ‘policy’?

These two onsets against the Redan cost our people not only the lives of the two commanders who led them—Colonel Yea and General Sir John Campbell—but also in killed and wounded 62 other officers, and more than 700 men.*

Losses resulting from the assault on the Redan.

XIV.

The ascendant thus promptly obtained by the guns of our siege-train opened room for the hope that another attack with infantry might soon be launched against batteries no longer in that prime condition to which the enemy had restored them in the course of the night, but on the contrary crippled by artillery-fire; and, having in hand the column—still fresh and untouched—that had been formed for an attack on the salient of the Redan, Lord Raglan proposed to unleash it, if the measure should seem to harmonise with the state of Péliſſier’s operations on the other side of the Prospect opened by the success of the fire from the siege-guns.

* Viz., 717, a number including 52 (out of only 120) sailors. The ‘62’ includes six naval officers.

CHAP.
VII.

Lord Raglan and Pélissier in communication.

The two chiefs together.

Messages from d'Automarre.

gorge. Communications accordingly passed between the two commanders, and at first were effected by message; but afterwards Lord Raglan determined to confer with his colleague in person. He accordingly rode off with his staff to the Lancaster Battery, where Pélissier had established himself, and there, standing apart, the two chiefs conversed for some time. They apparently determined at first that, Pélissier undertaking to support and drive home General d'Autemarre's onslaught, Lord Raglan on his part should renew his endeavour to carry the Great Redan; but it seems that the conference between the two chiefs was from time to time interrupted by message after message brought in from General d'Autemarre, and that the latest of those communications determined Pélissier's course.

XV.

Continued
operations of d'Automarre's
troops.

When last we observed the operations of General d'Autemarre's troops, the battalion of the 5th Chasseurs at one point, and the little body of some 80 Engineers at another, were, each of them, holding what each had daringly seized when breaking in at two places through the enemy's lines of defence; but, on the other hand, although striving hard to reinforce their victorious comrades, the main body of General d'Autemarre's Division had as yet been striving in vain.

This balanced condition of things had a lengthened duration ; for both the battalion of Chasseurs which had conquered its way into a part of the Faubourg, and the little body of 80 Engineers which had seized the Gervais Battery held what they had each of them won with persistent valour ; and on the other hand, General d'Autemarre's efforts to reinforce the bold men thus maintaining themselves in the fortress were defeated one after another by the severity of the fire poured down on his troops from the enemy's powerful batteries.

CHAP.
VII

The motives that needs must have urged him to effect the reinforcement attempted were beyond measure strong ; for, to compass the object pursued, was not only to support his brave Frenchmen then holding all they had seized within the lines of the fortress, but also by that very act to gain means of operating effectively (because from within the defences) against the flank and rear of the Malakoff ; whilst, to fail in sending down reinforcements would be to abandon the victors who had lodged themselves in the fortress, but also to surrender all hope of seeing the day end in victory.

Whilst striving, though vainly, to succour those of his men who had torn their way into the fortress, General d'Autemarre likewise was praying to be himself reinforced ; and Pélissier met the appeal by calling up from his reserve the whole regiment of the Zouaves of the Guard ;* but these

* He could not throw forward the two brigades with which he had consented to form an intermediate reserve, because, as

CHAP.
VII troops had a lengthened distance to traverse before they could come into action, and the occasion first offered by Fortune, then valiantly seized by the brave Engineers and brave Chasseurs, might not much longer endure.

When the French battalion of Chasseurs had planted itself in the Faubourg, it was assailed by General Khrouleff in person with at first only a few score men of the regiment of Sevsk, but presently also with one of the Pultawa battalions.* There ensued an obstinate conflict, the Chasseurs intrepidly doing their best to strengthen themselves in the houses, and the Russians on the other hand striving to press, as it were, a small siege against each of the occupied buildings. All this while, too, the 80 Engineers unaided by infantry were still holding fast the battery which they had wrested from the enemy's troops.

Yet, if left unsupported, the struggles of a few gallant men who had lodged themselves in an enemy's fortress could be hardly much longer maintained; and on the other hand, though hitherto baffled in all the efforts he had made to accomplish the object desired, General d'Autemarre was still trying hard to reinforce the invaders.

The conflict thus drew to a crisis. If only the reinforcements should move down and join their we saw, they had received their orders too late, and were not on the ground. See ante, pp. 152, 156.

* The one under Captain Born which had been driven out of the Gervais Battery by the 80 French Engineers.

comrades, there well might follow a conquest involving the fall of Sebastopol. If not, the brave men who had broken through the Russian defences, and long held the ground they had won, would perforce be all sacrificed, or driven out of the fortress ; and, there being no other path open for even attempting assaults on the works of the Karabelnaya, it followed that the crisis of the conflict undertaken by d'Autemarre's troops would be also nothing less than the crisis of the whole day's engagement, excepting only that part of it on the skirts of Sebastopol town where General Eyre was commanding.

CHAP.
VII.

A time at last came when, no reinforcements approaching, the men of the Chasseurs battalion were forced to abandon the ground they had seized in the Karabelnaya, and when also fresh bodies of men—men drawn from the Jakoutsk regiment—assailed and recaptured the Gervais Battery, driving out what remained of the little body of 80 French Engineers which had gallantly seized and long held it. Their commander, the brave Major Abinal, who had led the attack, and remained to the last in the battery, was one of those mortally wounded.*

The battalions of the Zouaves of the Guards that had been called up from the somewhat too distant reserve appeared at length on the ground, but by that time the crisis had passed, and they never were brought into action.

* Niel, p. 314.

XVI.

Pelissier.

Pélissier had not yet reached the end of that interval, eight days in length, during which he seemed not to enjoy the full command of his powers; and those who have studied his character will say, unless I mistake, that, if even he judged aright (as indeed he apparently did) when determining to abandon the struggle, he nevertheless in so doing was strangely unlike himself.

It would be a mistake, and altogether unfair to base any estimate of Pélissier's capacity upon what he either did or omitted to do in the course of that unhappy interval.

Pélissier, so far as I learn, gave no account to his Emperor or to any one else of the main, the governing facts which brought about his discomfiture; did not—even indirectly—confess that by breaking loose from the engagement made with Lord Raglan on the 17th, he had caused the troops, French and English, to fling their strength on a fortress at the height of its power instead of one shattered anew (after all the repairs of the night) by a wisely designed cannonade.(7) Pélissier spoke indeed of one phase—the phase next about to be mentioned—that marked the engagement in its latter stage, and assigned it as a reason to justify his final decision; but this phase, after all, was a simply direct result of his wayward mistakes, and not an originating cause of the step we shall now see him take.

Moved, he says, by the fact that d'Autemarre was without support on either flank, Péliſſier—at least for the day—abandoned all hope of breaking through the defences, and at seven o'clock in the morning, or perhaps somewhat later, he withdrew his troops from the front.* The retrograde movement was made without being gravely molested by troops sent out in pursuit.

CHAP.
VIL

His resolve to abandon the struggle.

XVII.

The movement on the Tchernaya resulted in no operations that need, as I think, be recorded.

The movement on the Tchernaya.

XVIII.

The only onset this day that ended victoriously was the one undertaken against ground skirting Sebastopol on the eastern side of the town, and entrusted to General Eyre with a single brigade that numbered some 2000 men. The general was to descend the ravine that took its name from the Piquet House there held by the French, to attack the line of rifle-pits established below, and finally to endeavour to occupy some ground in advance whence ulterior operations might be advantageously effected, and this more especially if the great attacks to be made in other parts of the

*Attack
led by General
Eyre.*

* The Russians assign 7 o'clock as the time, and are probably near the truth, but Péliſſier puts the time later, that is, at 8.30 A.M. He, however, perhaps referred to the time when his people regained the trenches.

CHAP. field should be happily crowned with success.
VII. The troops destined to oppose this attack were all the battalions of the Okhotsk, and some portions of the Tomsk regiment.* Both these regiments had encountered our people at Inkerman, and might not perhaps now prove disposed to show themselves much in the open, but rather to take advantage of shelter.

General Eyre began his march at about half-past one in the morning. When approaching the rifle-pits and preparing to attack them in front, he all at once found himself anticipated by a body of French Chasseurs posted near, which cleverly took them in flank.† Then—as though under some precise order—the share our Allies were thus taking in the early part of the onset came all at once to an end.

General Eyre still however advancing, soon found in position before him some Russian troops strongly posted, their right resting on a Mamelon, their left on a cemetery, the ground between being intersected, and the road barricaded with stone walls. The Russians were ensconced behind cover, and General Eyre could not estimate their number. In rear of the stone walls were houses occupied by the enemy, and yet further in rear, troops held in reserve could be seen.

The position was strong, and being under the guns of the fortress, including those of the Périssip, could hardly be taken without incurring serious loss; but it seems to have been judged * Tedleben, vol. ii. p. 876.

† The 10th Chasseurs.

that the object was worthy the sacrifice. Despite the fire thinning their ranks, our troops advanced with great gallantry, pulled down the stone walls, soon carried the whole position, and then pushing on, seized and occupied numbers of houses, some in front, some on the right, some under the Garden Wall Battery.

CHAP.
VII.

The question whether all or how much of the conquest thus made should be permanently retained by our people was dependent at first on the course of events in other parts of the field, but afterwards on the judgment of our Engineers, the men best able to say what part of the newly won ground was likely to be of use to the besiegers; and therefore the commander resolved to hold all he had seized until the time when authority should be ready to determine the question. This he accordingly did, and it was only at five o'clock in the evening that he made any change. Then—unmolested by the enemy—his troops were withdrawn from that part of the conquered ground which our Engineers did not wish to retain, whilst in that other part which it seemed expedient to keep, strong posts were duly established. By this time, computing from daybreak, when the firing is believed to have opened, the action had lasted scarce less than fourteen hours. The ground General Eyre retained was afterwards fortified under the direction of our Engineers.

From one of the enemy's missiles in the early part of the day, General Eyre had received a blow

CHAP.
VII.

in the head which, though heavy, still did not for some time disable him; but afterwards, the wound, or its consequences, became so far incapacitating as to force him to give up the command. This accordingly he handed over to Colonel Adams of the 28th Regiment.

Eyre's conquest of ground in this part of the field might have proved to be a gain of great moment, if the other and main operations of the Allies had been blest by good fortune; but, the contrary event having happened, it cannot be said that the gain achieved by this little victory was sufficient to weigh in a balance against the heavy loss it entailed. The loss was grave, comprising in killed and wounded no less than 562 (of whom 31 were officers), and this, too, out of a body that was only some 2000 strong.(*)

XIX.

Losses sustained in the engagements of the 18th of June.

According to official statements, the losses in killed, wounded, and missing sustained on this day by the Russians were 1500;* by the French, about 3500;† by the English, 1505.‡ General

* Todleben, vol. ii. p. 380. The whole loss of the Russians in the two days, 17th and 18th, is stated, ibid., p. 379, at 5446, but of those casualties no less than 4000 were sustained, as before shown, under the bombardment of the 17th.

† Niel, p. 319. The exact number there given is 3651, but that return included a few score of men killed or wounded the day before.

‡ Official Returns, including those from the Navy.

Todleben received a wound in the head, which, however, he treated as slight. CHAP.
VII.

It proved that the 'missing' comprised in the returns of the Allies were, some of them, prisoners in the hands of the enemy, whilst others were men killed and wounded who could not be all at once found. Of prisoners other than those who died of their wounds in Sebastopol, the enemy took 287 Frenchmen, including 17 officers; and from the English only six, including one officer.* Even of those six, all or some, if not all, when made prisoners, had been probably wounded.

Of the six French and English commanders who led the six attacks, we saw no less than four killed in action; whilst also a fifth one—Eyre—received a wound that disabled him.†

XX.

By the high-couraged energy with which they had restored their batteries to perfect efficiency in the night of the 17th of June, the Russians acquired or regained priceless means of defence; and when afterwards engaged in the action, they went through the easier task of using their recovered power with a steadiness, spirit, and vigour which, with only the exception we marked—

The high merit of the Russian defence.

* Todleben, vol. ii. p. 881.

† See in the Appendix a highly interesting private letter from Lord Raglan on the subject of these engagements of the 18th of June. (*)

CHAP. one not destined to alter events—prevented all
VIL the attacks attempted against the enceinte from being pushed home, or even carried so far as to be closely approaching the counterscarps.

Prince Gortchakoff's statements.

The whole scheme of the great Engineer defending Sebastopol was—not to maintain but—prohibit what Englishmen mean by a ‘fight’—to baffle all attempts on the part of the besiegers to come to close quarters by the fire he poured down from his ramparts; and this object he so well achieved that (except in the instance adduced) the counterscarps of the Karabelnaya defences from the west of the Great Redan to the eastermost end of ‘the Point’ were never once reached, were never once closely approached by any assailants. Yet in face of this truth—now well shown and recorded by Russians, French, and English alike—Prince Michael Gortchakoff allowed himself to represent that his troops had been fighting, as it were, a grand battle, had fought it too at close quarters, and had won it by bayonet-charges! To make the fable consistent with itself, the inventor ascribed to the assaulting columns of the Allies a degree of initial success which—unhappily—they never attained, declaring that they had come up with their ladders to the works of defence and were scaling the parapets when they found themselves met by ‘the ‘points’ of the Russian bayonets and were thrown back into the Ditches;(<sup>6</sup>) the truth, we know, being that—always shattered by fire in some earlier stage of their marches the columns never were able to close on the Russian defences, CHAP.

except when a brief inadvertence enabled the VII.
battalion of Chasseurs, with besides the 80
French Engineers, to evade the enemy's cannon, and that those little bodies of men—far from meeting any 'bayonet-points'—overcame with great ease the spiritless resistance attempted, established themselves in the fortress, and there,
although unsupported, long held their ground against numbers.*

XXI.

When endeavouring to account for his discom- Pélissier's fiture, Pélissier laid a great stress on the several explanamishaps of the early morning which had prevented tions.
his three great attacks from taking effect simultaneously, and cast blame on the two commanders —General Mayran and General Brunet—who both had been killed in the action. It is true perhaps that the accidents assigned by Pélissier gave the enemy a little advantage by interposing some time between the onset of Mayran and those of Brunet and d'Autemarre; but the all-governing <sup>The real</sup> cause of the repulse sustained by the Allies was <sup>cause of</sup> <sup>his failure</sup> that wild change of purpose of the preceding evening which enabled the garrison to confront the besiegers at dawn with the whole of the vast

* It is right to say that in time Prince Gortchakoff's curious fiction was suppressed by the Russians themselves, or not at all events suffered to have any place in the great official account which recorded their defence of Sebastopol.

CHAP. ordnance powers they had wielded before the bombardment. In that very Dockyard Ravine where the enemy had failed to arrest the advancing head of a column, his almost insuperable power was quickly proved with great clearness; for, though (owing to some inadvertence) the battalion of French Chasseurs and the 80 French Engineers had been suffered to reach the defences on the western flank of the Malakoff, and had then broken through them, those troops in their rear that formed the bulk of the column were so peremptorily stopped or fended back by the enemy's restored batteries as to be debarred from performing what must otherwise have proved the glad task of moving into the fortress by paths already laid open, and there reinforcing the men who had brilliantly shown them the way.

The sudden change of design which brought General Pélissier to send infantry encumbered with ladders across distances of several hundreds of yards in the teeth of great batteries restored to their full power of destructiveness was an error on so huge a scale that, when once it had taken effect, no skill unaided by Fortune could well have averted discomfiture. Fortune once—only once—seemed to smile. First, lulling the enemy's gunners, she gave her hand to brave men thus enabled to move down unscathed, and carried them into the fortress, where, after overthrowing their adversaries, they long maintained a firm hold of the ground they had won; but—perhaps from no fault of either—General d'Autemarre CHAP.

first, and then the French Commander-in-Chief, proved unable to seize their occasion by reinforcing the victors. Not interposing again, Fortune thenceforth abandoned the Allies to what was the natural consequence of Pélissier's fatal resolve.

Except in that one chosen quarter where Fortune had seemed—for a while—to take part, there was never from the first to the last any trustworthy basis for hope that either the French or the English could even so much as begin an assault on the enemy's works. The French troops confronting defences from the Battery of the Point to the eastern face of the Malakoff, and the English on their part confronting the batteries of the Great Redan, gave themselves with unsparing devotion and at large cost of life and limb to their several tasks; but, encumbered with ladders, and striving to traverse long distances under fire of great might from the ramparts, they were always so rudely mown down long before coming up to the countescarpas as to have no means at all left them for carrying the defences by storm.

With respect to Pélissier's failure, the comment of Todleben is that he attempted what (after the repairs effected at night) was virtually impracticable, and omitted to do what was perfectly feasible—that is, to attack the town front.*

On the efforts our people directed against the Redan, the published comment of Todleben is to * Todleben, vol. ii. pp. 381, 382.

CHAP.
VII.

the effect that they attempted the enterprise with too small a force;* but none knew better than he that under the existing conditions, increase of numerical strength meant proportionate increase of slaughter; and I hardly can think he believed, or deliberately intended to say that, if ever moving up in gross numbers beneath the fire from his ramparts, the English remaining unscathed after having passed through such an ordeal could or would have been many enough to storm and carry the Work. Standing with me years afterwards on the site of the Malakoff, he pointed out the strong lineaments—not then yet effaced by Time—of what had been batteries sweeping the north of the Woronzoff Ridge, and showed that under their fire—showed indeed with the air of one pointing to what all might see at a glance that—in numbers great enough for assault at the close of their march, troops approaching the Redan could not live.

From the opening of the fire before daybreak until he gave his last order, and abandoned the strife, it can hardly be said that Pélissier brought Mind to bear on the issue with any telling effect. He indeed, as we saw, sent an order directing General d'Angély to aid with four fresh battalions the repulsed troops of Mayran's Division, yet did not by this step prolong, nor even renew, the combat; and again at a later time he called for the Zouaves of the Guard to support General d'Atemarre; but before they came into action, he ordered a retreat, and put an end to the conflict. CHAP.

* Todleben, vol. II. p. 382.

VII.

It would seem that that last step, however, was a step rightly taken; for—because not supported in time by the accession of any fresh troops—the occupation of a part of the fortress by the brave Engineers and the Chasseurs had come at last to an end.

XXII.

Undertaken to meet a contingency that did not occur, and involving a grave loss of men, the attack we saw General Eyre drive through the 'Garden-wall' skirts of Sebastopol must be deemed on the whole to have ended in a dearly bought victory, and a dearly bought conquest of ground.

Costliness of General Eyre's victory in proportion to the advantages gained.

CHAPTER VIII.

SEBASTOPOL AFTER THE ENGAGEMENT.—GENERAL TODLEBEN WOUNDED.—HIS DEFENCE OF SEBASTOPOL.

I.

CHAP.
VIII.

The veil between warring armies;

BETWEEN any two modern armies opposing each other in war, though not, for the moment, in battle, there always hangs more or less thickly a dim, confusing mist, which neither the one nor the other can all at once lift by aid of deserters or spies, and, because excluding sound knowledge whilst also leaving free room for the play of conjecture, this ceaselessly interposed veil must often of course have its share in determining the will of commanders, forcing each, after all, to depend a good deal on his powers to divine things unknown; so that neither perhaps will attack, unless he proves strong at imagining the unhopeful state of his adversary.

If, when our siege-guns ceased firing on the morning of the 18th of June, the baffled and troubled besiegers could only have looked through the 'veil,' they perhaps might have taken Sebas-

Between Sebastopol
and its besiegers.

topol before the close of the day. Yet, if at that very same time, a glance through the 'veil' had been only vouchsafed to the then dispirited garrison, they would promptly have seen that their efforts were proving successful, and would earn them a long time of respite from any determined attacks.

By repulsing all five of the columns which the French and the English had launched against their works of defence, and yielding to only one force—the force commanded by Eyre which did not attack their enceinte—the garrison had earned a good right to rejoice in the general result of their whole morning's work ; but strangely enough it occurred that, for want of a glance through the 'veil,' their hour of real deliverance was to them an hour of deep gloom, and of even some approach to despair.

Coming after the terrible losses inflicted upon them by siege-guns, not only in the earlier days of June, but before, in the month of April, the sacrifices made by the garrison—not so much whilst encountering infantry on the morning of the 18th, but rather when exposed, as they had been on the previous day, to the mercies of the Fourth Bombardment—had brought about in the Army a feeling of something like horror not unmixed with grave indignation against a plan of defence which so ruthlessly exacted its victims.* This was only too natural. The best battalions

CHAP.
VIII.

The garrison. Its achievement.

Its actual state of feeling towards the close of the engagement

* Accounts of deserters. Letters from Headquarters, vol. ii. p. 350.

CHAP. there are might well betray a want of contentment when doomed—not to fight, as brave men would be ready to do, but—to stand—standing idle—under the fire of siege-batteries, upon one chosen pittance of ground, and there submit to be torn by round-shot and shell, lest their presence by chance should be needed in order to repel some assault.

This necessity of keeping troops ready for imagined contingencies under the fire of siege-batteries, without any shelter from casemates or other appliances, was of course a weak point in the plan of defence. It brought wounds or death to several thousands of men, and on all the troops so employed inflicted the moral torture of having to stand simply passive under the fire of great guns without being able themselves to strike a blow in return.

However, if not with good grace, and not without signs that the endurance of the brave Russian soldiery had been strained to nearly its utmost, the torture of the Fourth Bombardment was borne by the Army in Sebastopol on the 17th of June; and Péliſſier's infatuation prevented its being renewed in the earlier hours of the following day; but, when after the baffled assaults of the 18th of June, our siege-guns opened once more, and the Russians again underwent a havoc and slaughter renewing their yesterday's trial of fortitude, the feeling that appears to have seized on a part of the garrison was one of bitter, angry discouragement approaching with some to despair and with many indeed, it would seem, that the CHAP.

feeling ran into panic. According to the accounts VIII.
of deserters, the soldiery in great numbers ran down to the shore of the Roadstead, and fought with their own fellow-countrymen for the boats and the rafts they there found, wildly striving to escape from Sebastopol, and gain the peaceful
'North Side.'*

This despair, or approach to despair, on the part of troops well entitled to exult in their happy achievement, was not destined of course to be lasting; but the garrison did not cease all at once to stand in grave need of encouragement; and perhaps a requirement so pressing may have led men to frame in great haste such accounts of a glorious infantry battle as they thought would best cheer the dispirited soldiery, thus supplying material for the strange fabrication which substituted mere hollow fable for the truth known to thousands, yet purported to draw its authority from the Russian Commander-in-chief.†

The Russians—navy and army, engineers, artillery, infantry—having all, or nearly all, done their duty with valour and steadiness down to almost the close of the action, and having repulsed every column attempting to storm the enceinte, might have well been rewarded and cheered with perfectly well-founded praise; yet, because, when our siege-guns reopened, a part of the garrison

The Czar's
infantry in grave need of encouragement;

whence apparently the fabrication of the 18th
of June.

* Accounts of deserters, Letters from Headquarters, vol. II. p. 355.

† See ante, chap. vii. p. 210 et seq.

CHAP.
VIII. faltered, and began to lose heart, some restorative better than truth was apparently thought to be needed. The garrison was gravely told that it had fought at close quarters with the hosts of the besiegers, and defeated them with our old Russian friend, 'the too often fabulous bayonet!'

Thanks-givings.

A more legitimate way of restoring heart to the troops was found with the aid of the priests who—made sacred in the eyes of the Russians by their sacred costumes,<sup>(4)</sup> and carrying their time-honoured implements of worship—came out on the morrow of the action to the lines of defence, and there led the chants of Thanksgiving for the 'mercy,' as our Cromwell would call it, vouchsafed on the previous morning.

Just right of the garrison to indulge in selfgratulation.

With any such pious acknowledgments a little fair self-gratulation is always compatible, and the brave survivors of those who had undergone the dreadful bombardment of the 17th of June, who had toiled through the night in repairing their shattered batteries under vertical fire, who, next day, manning their ramparts, had stood—had stood firm—against five advancing columns, and not less, those who had faced the renewed bombardment which followed without—like some of their comrades—beginning to harbour despair, were able to indulge a just pride, not only in what they had done, but yet more in what they had borne.

II.

Ill-omened, however, this time, were the public thanksgivings! On the very next day, General Todleben was wounded by a ball in the calf of his right leg; and his surgeon, observing the symptoms, strongly pressed him to leave the town in all haste. This in absolute terms the general refused to do. The commander-in-chief of the garrison then came to the side of his couch; but it was only after strong persuasion that he prevailed upon Todleben to retire to the home of M. Sarandansky—a country-house on the Belbec.* There—because inflammation set in—he long remained prostrate, and too often enduring great pain.

Todleben wounded;
and removed
from Sebastopol.

Thus passed away from Sebastopol its mighty defender. It is true that the cares of war followed him, that reports which imparted more or less freshly, and more or less accurately the ever-varying phases of the siege and defence, were day by day brought him, and that from his bed of suffering too often indeed during moments when the pain he endured was severe, he showed those who came how to meet the then newly extant conditions, doing this, it is said, with all his old clearness, and with that strong, that sure grasp of mind for which he was famed amongst those who long had toiled under his orders.†

The partly still took.

* Ernshoff, Part VIII. leaf 79 of the MS. translation I have.

† Ibid.

CHAP.
VIII.

The way in which until wounded, he had brought his power to bear.

But we know that Todleben's method of bringing brain power to bear on each problem coming before him had rested much more than is common on his own actual, bodily presence. By scanning reports, and penning or dictating orders, other men have made themselves conquerors, and few, I suppose, would disparage the mode they have found well adapted for giving effect to their plans. But not such was this great soldier's way of bringing his power to bear. It was not at table or desk, but on that black charger of his which our people used to watch with their glasses that he mainly defended Sebastopol.* It was always with his very own eyes that he liked to fasten on knowledge, with his very own voice that he liked to give special orders, with his very own presence that he carried from rampart to rampart the passion of a warlike resolve.

The difference caused by his removal.

The withdrawal of a power long wielded in this special, personal way was not of course one to be compensated by any such notes or messages as a wounded and suffering patient might send from his couch miles away in the Belbec valley; and, although I have no right to say that, so soon as this leader of men—suffering under his wound—had been carried away from his Fortress, the famous defence of Sebastopol began to decline, it still must be owned that thenceforward no other day meet for Thanksgivings awaited the garrison; nor less is it true that, when no longer met by his presence amongst the defenders, rash counsels began to prevail. The Czar's army, wildly attempting to dispute with the French and Sardinians for the banks of the lower Tchernaya, was soon to receive at their hands a calamitous defeat in the field.*

* See ante, vol. iv. pp. 145, 146. The interesting identification at Woolwich to which Todleben's black charger contributed is there mentioned in the foot-note to page 146.

CHAP.
VIII

No thanksgivings thenceforth for the Russians;

but approaching defeat in the field.

The more narrow-minded men of the Czar's Army, and even, whilst Nicholas lived, the confused Czar himself, would have thought they sufficiently described the real defender of Sebastopol by calling him an 'Engineer Officer,' with perhaps superadded some epithet such as 'excellent,' or 'able,' or 'good'; and it is true that his skill in that 'branch' of the service enabled the great volunteer to bring his power to bear at a critical time; but it would be a wild mistake to imagine that, because fraught with knowledge and skill on one special subject, his mind was a mind at all prone to run in accustomed, set grooves. He was by nature a man great in war, and richly gifted with power, not only to provide in good time for the dimly expected conditions which it more or less slowly unfolds, but to meet its most sudden emergencies. When, for instance, we saw him at Inkerman in a critical moment, he, in theory, was only a spectator on horseback;

The position of Tedleba in Sebastopol;

* With all such of course lessened power as he could exert from his bed of suffering on the Belbek, the wounded General opposed the rash counsels which led to the battle of the Tchernaya.

CHAR.
VIII.

but, to avert the impending disaster, he instantly assumed a command. He seized, if so one may speak, on a competent body of troops, and rescued from imminent capture the vast, clubbed, helpless procession of Mentschikoff's retreating artillery.*

He was only at first a volunteer colonel, and was afterwards even, no more, in the language of formalists, than a general commanding the Engineers in a fortress besieged; but the task he designed, the task he undertook, the task he — till wounded — pursued with a vigour and genius that astonished a gazing world was — not this or that fraction of a mighty work, but simply — the whole defence of Sebastopol. Like many another general, he from time to time found himself thwarted, and too often encountered obstructions; but upon the whole, even after the 'heroic period,' when the glorious sailors were mainly his trust and his strength, there glowed in the hearts of the Russians withstanding foreign invasion a genuine spirit of patriotism which not only brought them to face the toils and dangers of war with ready devotion, but even in a measure kept down the growth of ignoble jealousies directed against this true chief.

and in the war generally.

The task of defending Sebastopol was a charge of superlative moment, and drew to itself before long the utmost efforts that Russia could bring to bear on the war.

Since the fortress — because not invested —

* Ante, vol. vi. pp. 450, 451.

stood open to all who would save it, and only closed against enemies, the troops there at any time planted were something more than a 'garrison,' being also in truth the foremost column of troops engaged in resisting invasion; and moreover the one chosen body out of all the Czar's forces which had in charge his great jewel—the priceless Sebastopol Roadstead.

The invaders and the invaded alike had from time to time fondly dwelt on plans for deciding the fate of Sebastopol by means of action elsewhere; but the Russians, deterred from 'adventures' by the terrible Inkerman day, had since been avoiding recourse to the leverage of field operations attempted with any such object; and, on the other hand, General Péliassier by his great strength of will had substantially brought the invaders to follow a like resolve. From this avoidance on both sides of serious field operations, it resulted of course that hostilities became, as it were, condensed on the Sebastopol battle-field.

There, accordingly, and of course with intensity proportioned to the greatness and close concentration of efforts made on both sides, the raging war laid its whole stress.

On the narrow arena thus chosen, it was Russia, all Russia that clung to Sebastopol, with its faubourg the Karabelnaya; and, since Todleben there was conducting the defence of the place, it follows from what we have seen, that he was chief over that very part of the Czar's gathered, gathering armies which had 'the jewel' in charge; and moreover that, call him a Sapper, or call him a warlike dictator, or whatever men choose, he was the real commander for Russia on the one confined seat of conflict where all the long-plotted hostilities of both the opposing forces had drawn at last to a head.

CHAP.
VIII

To appreciate the power he wielded, and distinguish him from an officer defending an invested fortress, one again must recur to the peculiar nature of the strife on which France and England had entered. Though maintained in great part with the kind of appliances that are commonly used by the assailants and defenders of fortresses, the conflict was so strongly marked in its character by the absence of complete investment as to be rather a continuous battle between two entrenched armies than what men in general mean when they casually speak of a 'siege.' Each force, if thus lastingly engaged, was likewise all the while drawing an equally lasting support, the one from all Russia exerting the strength of the Empire in her own dominions, the other from what was not less than a great European Alliance with full command of the sea.

The commander of a fortress besieged in the normal way, cut off from the outer world, must commonly dread more or less the exhaustion of his means of defence; but no cares of that exact kind cast their weight on the mind of the chief engaged in defending Sebastopol; for being left wholly free to receive all the succours that Russia might send him, he had no exhaustion to fear, except indeed such an exhaustion affecting Russia herself as would prevent her furnishing means for the continued defence of the fortress.

CHAP.
VIII.

The garrison holding Sebastopol, and made, one may say inexhaustible by constant reinforcement, used in general to have such a strength as the Russians themselves thought well fitted for the defence of the fortress; and, if they did not augment it, this was simply because greater numbers for service required behind ramparts would have increased the exacted sacrifices, without doing proportionate good.

But in truth—because constantly drawing fresh accessions of strength from the rear—this peculiarly circumstanced garrison represented both a power and a sacrifice that could not be measured by merely counting its numbers at any one given time. The force was so privileged as to be exempt from the weakness of armies with dwindling numbers. The garrison was ever young, ever strong, ever equal in numbers to what were considered its needs. It was constantly indeed sending off great numbers of men sick and wounded to hospitals over the Roadstead, and was always contributing largely to ‘the grave of the hundred thousand’ in the Severnaya;* but the wounded,

* On the Severnaya, or North Side, there is a sepulchre (sanctified by a church) called grandly by Russians ‘the tomb of the hundred thousand.’ The real number of sailors and soldiers sacrificed at Sebastopol, and laid in this ‘tomb’ was the sick, the dead were constantly replaced by fresh troops ; and even a plague of down-heartedness in the soldiery such as showed itself on the 18th of June, was an evil that the commander of the garrison knew how to shake off by marching away the dispirited regiments, and promptly filling their places with troops in a more warlike mood.

CHAP.
VIII.

Great of course was the power, though not to be told by arithmetic, of an ever fresh body of troops thus peculiarly circumstanced, with Todleben's mighty defences to cover their front; but proportionately great was the strain that Sebastopol put upon Russia by continually exacting fresh troops for a garrison that was fast losing men, yet—on peril of a fatal disaster—must always be kept in due strength.

Because he defended the fortress under all these conditions at a time when the forces on each side were avoiding grave field operations, General Todleben, I think, must be said to have virtually held the command in that protracted conflict which we have almost been ready to call a 'continuous 'battle,' and indeed—since the Inkerman day—to have virtually wielded the power—the whole of the power that Russia opposed to her invaders on the Sebastopol theatre of war.

not quite so great as the 'round number' imports, but great enough (speaking poetically) to warrant the tragic surname.

III.

The glory—true glory—attaching to the defence of Sebastopol in its early and grandest period was kept veiled from the Russians themselves by, in some things, the misleading utterances, in others, the misleading silence, if not indeed by the ignorance, of their own unfortunate Czar.

How this happened, we easily learn. To appreciate the glory there was in battling with that dark sea of troubles which confronted Korniloff and Todleben, the first condition of course is to know in a general way what the troubles they faced really were; and this, as it happened, was knowledge of exactly that kind which a man in the station of Nicholas might very well fail to acquire, or, if acquiring it, choose to withhold from the ears of his people; for where could the Czar find informants brave enough to acquaint him in full with the reign that sprang up in Sebastopol on the 25th of September, and how could the man tell his people of that collapse of his Government and of his Army which had opened occasion for lawless, volunteered services? how bring himself to see and acknowledge that the intrepid defence of Sebastopol in its earlier and noblest epoch was achieved, so to speak, by—as though they were dare-devil English, or dare-devil Anglo-Americans—a little commonwealth of brave men, exempt for the time from attaching to the early defence of Sebastopol;

The glory

this kept veiled from the Russians themselves.

CHAP.
VIII.

all imperial governance, and deserted by the Emperor's army? Above all, how confess that men for the moment cast loose from the rule of the Czars knew how to do what was essentially an Emperor's work—knew how to find a great general?

The truth is, that that very period which was one of great glory for the people of Russia, was also, as we have seen, one of shame for not only the Czar, but the Czardom; and, the light of knowledge in those days being under official control, Russia could not learn much at the time of the heroism with which a few thousands of her people, when fairly cast loose from their Government, stood up against the Invaders.

As in France, when the long war had ended, schoolmasters taught little children that the battles of Marengo and Austerlitz had been gained—after prayers to his saint—by the pious and valiant King Louis; so Nicholas—blind to the truth, or trampling it down under foot, ignored the superb interregnum that began in Sebastopol towards the close of September, and wildly claimed for his 'Army,' that is, in a sense for himself, all the glory that had been won in the interval by a man and by men for the moment cast loose from Imperial rule, and taking that place of danger which the 'Army,' as we saw, had left vacant.

When Nicholas died, the Government of his successor dealt wisely enough with the fact that there had been at Sebastopol a brief interregnum, when the glory achieved by brave Russians contrasted with the plight of the Government. They adopted, if so we may speak, the great volunteer; and, although not apparently strong enough in the face of known army prejudices to give him—to give him ostensibly—a wider command than that of general officer commanding the Engineers in a fortress, they yet duly provided, or suffered Prince Gortchakoff to provide, that he who had conceived, had begun, had maintained the glorious defence of Sebastopol, should still have the power required for going on with his task.

CHAP.
VIII.

That, whilst the war lasted, the Government of the new Czar should aid in bringing to light the true history of 'the interregnum' was hardly to be expected; for no man, when dealing with the events which began towards the close of September, could well give a just meed of praise to the heroes of that trying time without confessing the facts—facts shaming of course to the Czardom—which gave them the occasion they seized; and it seems to have resulted that, at the time of the war, the Russians in general were kept ill acquainted, or not acquainted at all, with what, in those days, was so gloriously achieved by their people.

If allowed at the time to have full acquaintance with what seems to me a great page in their history, the Russians might perhaps have inferred that their uniform discomfiture in the open field,

CHAP.
VIII. their overthrow in every battle attempted against the invaders, was, after all, rather traceable to their system of government, than to any inherent defect in the quality of their race. That, of course, was a kind of discovery which their rulers might desire to avert.

Words recalling the early defence of Sebastopol.

To know, if only a little, of that strange time in Sebastopol when the guns on the Alma were heard; when, with what seemed mysterious suddenness, the sounds of battle all ceased; when afterwards—met riding southwards, alone or almost alone, bent down by fatigue and misfortune, Prince Mentschikoff gave from his saddle the order — perhaps well conceived, but hideous nevertheless — the order to sink men-of-war across the mouth of the Roadstead;

When he and his army retreated into Sebastopol; when—in secrecy and at night—with his army the Prince retreated again, retreating, this time, into what was nothing less than sheer exile from the then narrowed seat of war;

When Prince Mentschikoff not only ceased to know anything of the enemy from whom he was flying, but even for several days gave up intercourse with the 18,000 sailors of the now land-locked fleet under Admiral Korniloff, and all the other brave men he had left to their fate in Sebastopol;

When suddenly officers gazing from the Belvedere top of the Naval Library saw our red-coats in march for the road which descends from Mackenzie's Farm, and so by swift inference learnt that Sebastopol was about to be assailed from the south—assailed on its unprepared front; CHAP.

VIII.

When all at once, shifting his energies from the north to what now might well seem the doomed side of an inchoate fortress, the volunteer Colonel of Sappers came over the Roadstead, came forbidding, repressing despair, and replacing it by the healthy alternative of work, work, work, immense work; so that under his guidance the people of all sorts and conditions who had been left in Sebastopol—people having, it is true, for their main strength and main hope the superb 18,000 sailors of the landlocked fleet, commanded by their heroic Korniloff, addressed themselves to no less an object than that of defending Sebastopol against the victorious armies of England and France, entered therefore at once on their task of constructing defences and pursued it under the eyes of the enemy;

When, adding political courage to warlike valour, the heroic, devoted Admiral and the volunteer Colonel of Sappers proved able to form a resolve which to Russians a few days before would have seemed to overpass all the limits of human audacity, and without any sanction at all from their Czar or his Government, with none from the commander, Prince Menschikoff, went on to break up—for State reasons—a vast imperial structure—a structure no less than that of the whole Black Sea Fleet, and then promptly applied it, applied it material and men, applied it body and soul, to the work of fighting on shore;

CHAP.
VIII.

When at dawn on the 10th of October the joy of the defenders rose high, because they saw that the enemy had been opening trenches, and learnt that, far from seizing the place, he was going instead to besiege it; and next, eight days later, when having bombarded Sebastopol with their fleets and their land-service batteries, the Allies proved content to abstain from completing their work by assault,—to know, I say, if but a little, of this stirring epoch of only some twenty-eight days, is to have an idea of the perils which Korniloff and Todleben faced, is to see that the Russian people, if ennobled by a training like that received by their sailors instead of being crushed by excessive land-service drill, may prove themselves greater in war than they have seemed to be under their Czars; is to learn that, although he had remained undiscovered by their Government, and was only a volunteer officer, they knew when they had in their midst a born commander of men, and hastened to make him their leader.

Defence of Sebastopol
after the 17th of October

Todleben;

After the 17th of October, when Todleben's great undertaking had passed its desperate epoch, and the fortress every day growing stronger became and for some time remained an at least equal match for its foes, he who still carried on the defence under new conditions, who oppressed, almost mocked the besiegers with his counter-approaches; who still pursued month after month his steadfast design, and brought it to a climax victoriously on the morning of the 18th of June, was he who, if armed in the spring—some months after the fitting time!—with a share of official authority, still remained the same man as the volunteer Colonel of Sappers, whose greatness began in that interval when the Czardom for the moment had ceased to exercise sway in Sebastopol, leaving room in its stead for heroic, spontaneous action adventured by resolute men.

CHAP.
VIII.

---

And what Todleben achieved, he achieved in his very own way. Never hearkening apparently to the cant of the Russian army of those days which with troops marshalled closely like sheep professed to fight with the bayonet, he made it his task to avert all strife at close quarters, by pouring on any assailants such storms of mitraille as should make it impossible for them to reach the verge of his counterscarps. That is the plan he designed from the first, and the one he in substance accomplished.

From the day when he made his first efforts to cover with earthworks the suddenly threatened South Side to the time, more than eight months afterwards, when his wound compelled him to quit the fortress, he successfully defended Sebastopol; and, as we have seen, to do this—after Inkerman, or at all events after the onset attempted against Eupatoria—was to maintain the whole active resistance that Russia opposed to her invaders in the south-western Crimea.

his superlative part in the war

CHAP.
VIII.

Confined as it was to one narrow tract of ground, the strife involved nevertheless a trial of strength between great powers—powers no more sparing of blood or of treasure than if the war thus compressed were raging over vast territories.

One may say of Todleben, and the sailors, and the other brave men acting with them, that by maintaining the defence of Sebastopol, not only long after the 20th of September, but also long after the 5th of November, they twice over vanquished a moral obstacle, till then regarded as one that no man could well overcome.

The marine twice over refuted by the early defenders of Sebastopol.

'If a battle undertaken in defence of a fortress is fought and lost, the place will fall.' This, before the exploit of the great volunteer, was a saying enounced with authority as though it were almost an axiom that Science had deigned to lay down; yet after the defeat of their army on the banks of the Alma, after even its actual evasion from the neighbourhood of Sebastopol, he along with the glorious sailors and the rest of the people there left to their fate proved to be of such quality that, far from consenting to let the place 'fall,' as experience declared that it must, he and they—under the eyes of the enemy—began to create, and created that vast chain of fortress defence which, after more than eight months, we saw him still holding intact. And again, when—in sight of the Fortress it strove to relieve—an Army gathered in strength fought and lost with great slaughter the battle of Inkerman, sending into the Karabelnaya its thousands upon thousands of wounded soldiery, the resolute chief and brave garrison did not therefore remit, did not slacken, their defence of the place; so that—even twice over—by valour they refuted a saying till then held so sure that, receiving the assent of mankind, it had crystallised into a maxim.

CHAP.
VIII.

---

Yet, so far as I know, these brave men never vaunted in print or in speech the peculiar distinction they had won. Their triumph over the axiom twice superbly made good could only be shown by first telling of the defeats sustained in the field by their Czar's unfortunate armies, and that last condition apparently the loyal, generous men never cared to fulfil.

For other Russians the glory of having defended Sebastopol until the time we have reached was, after all, a forerunner of approaching defeat; but for Todleben personally, whilst still he toiled in the Fortress, no such reverse lay in wait. The time when he quitted it (wounded) was for him more than ever a time of victory, following close, as it did, on his crowning achievement made good on the 18th of June.

His personal glory dis-severed from the subsequent reverses of Russia.

If the Czar had come down to Sebastopol, or rather to the Karabelnaya, at the close of the engagement on the morning of the 18th of June, he might there have apostrophised Todleben, as he did long years after at Plevna, when saying: ‘Edward Ivanovitch, it is thou that hast accomplished it all! ’

CHAPTER IX.

PÉLISSIER AFTER HIS DISCOMFITURE.

CHAP. At the close of the assaults he had hazarded on IX. the 18th of June, Pélissier must needs have endured a more than common load of distress. He had chosen to follow a course so flighty and wayward that, in order to be ever condoned, his conduct seemed to require nothing less than the shield of a victory; yet after exacting from his army deplorable sacrifices, he had only encountered discomfiture. He had fiercely resisted his Emperor, had set at naught all the counsels (including those of Lord Raglan) which moved him to assail the Flagstaff Bastion then ripe for attack, had driven his foremost general from all command on the Heights for the crime of discerning with clearness what he himself failed to see; he had —why none can tell—broken loose from the engagement deliberately made with Lord Raglan on the morning of the 17th, and had ended by ruthlessly ordering that, next day, at dawn, three divisions of infantry should move forward across broad spaces of ground under the ruinous fire of

The distressing position
in which Pélissier
stood.

batteries no longer shattered and silent, but restored to their original strength, thus bringing down on his people the natural consequences of action so lawless and wild in the shape of repulses endured by all his attacking columns, and painful losses of men; whilst also, by the very discomfiture thus wildly incurred, he wrung from the English commander those unsparing endeavours to support him, which proved to be not only vain, but destructive to numbers of our men. And again, whatever the cause (whether temporary lessening of his accustomed brain-power, or simply want of good opportunity), it was not Pélissier's fate to be able to display in the action any signs of warlike ability.

CHAP.
IX.

Under all these conditions, the Emperor Louis Napoleon now found himself armed by events with better means of extinguishing his fierce, consumacious general than any he had wielded before, and he quickly began to exert the augmented power that thus had come into his hands; first harshly demanding with a dry, grave reserve, explanations, and full, plain accounts from the baffled, yet still proud commander, and afterwards even proceeding—though not with sustained perseverance—to remove him or try to remove him from the command of the army.

increased means of acting at acquired by the Emperor.

But Pélissier was a man very strong in adversity; and it even would seem that, although his full use of the powers which Nature had given him might be interrupted during several days by what are called 'worrying' troubles, his

Pélissier's strength in adversity.

CHAP. mind was so constituted as to be able to rise in its strength, so soon as he found himself challenged, and put on his mettle by grave misfortune. He not only came to the end of that brief, ill-omened interval of eight days during which, as we saw, his capacity appears to have failed him, but disclosed a great force of character, well supported by adroitness, audacity, and fertile resource, with besides, one must own, a return to his old, clever wiles, no longer now marred by a palpably scornful tone, and to even professions of suppleness which only some five days before, when not yet coerced by misfortune, he seemed to have proudly renounced.*

Opportune and successful endeavours of the English Government to check the Emperor's
interposi-
tion.

And, at this time, the English Government had happily done a good deal towards sheltering the French and Pélissier from the dangers of their sovereign's wild dictation; for they had made an agreement with the Emperor, which Lord Panmure thus described:—‘We have agreed with the Emperor that neither from Paris nor London shall any orders for operations be sent which are not mutual from our respective Governments;’† and they also took another wise step, that of sending General Torrens to Paris as their military commissioner, with instructions to keep them informed on the subject of the war, and to

* See ante, p. 188.

† Lord Panmure to Lord Raglan, 18th June 1855. The words may be ‘hard to construe;’ but not to understand, for they must have meant, I suppose, that neither of the two Governments should send out orders for operations without first apprising the other Government of its intention.

endeavour to smooth the anxiety of the Emperor.*

CHAP
IX.

These well-designed measures produced a wholesome effect, and perhaps may be said to have had no small share in determining the course of events.

There is ground for conjecture that the merit of taking these steps belonged in the main to Lord Palmerston.

I have not learnt that Pélissier, under the discipline of misfortune, confessed his mistakes to others in either writing or speech; but, by action, so far as he could, he retracted no less than two of the several false steps he had taken. On the second day after the engagement, he brought back General Bosquet to that wide command on the Heights from which, on the 16th of June, we saw the Chief thrusting him out.†

Bosquet brought back to his former command on the Heights;

and his opinion adopted by the Chief

Pélissier went even further on in the same right direction. Having wreaked his anger on Bosquet but a few days before for differing from him in judgment, he now adopted Bosquet's opinion, and freely abandoned his own. He acknowledged at last to himself, and—by deeds, though not words—to all the rest of the world, that, whilst armed with their powerful batteries in a state of efficiency, the defences of the Karabalya were not to be assaulted again by troops advancing against them across lengthened dis-

* Lord Panmure to Lord Raglan, 18th June 1855.

† Niel, p. 320.

C H A P. tances of unsheltered ground; and accordingly, as Bosquet had counselled, he determined, at the cost of huge sacrifices, to sap up almost close to the opposite counterscarps, before he again would confront them with his infantry columns.

Bis resolute, and brought to bear with effect.

Against a heap of adverse conditions which, if only the whole rugged truth had been known at St Cloud, must have seemed almost too hard to face, the undaunted Norman maintained himself in the confidence of Marshal Vaillant, War Minister, and still fended off the dictation attempted by Louis Napoleon.*

If I part from the interesting subject thus touched in only two sentences, it is because the pursuing it home would be passing the bounds of a narrative that professes to have a fixed limit.

Danger of the strife between Louis Napoleon and Pélissier.

Kept alive by the presence — the irritating presence — of Niel at the French Headquarters, the angry conflict maintained between Louis Napoleon and Pélissier was long a source of grave danger to the cause of the Allies; and I must not omit to acknowledge that the all-important duty of labouring to keep the strife within limits was discharged by a Minister of State with sound wisdom, good feeling, and skill.

The happily exerted

Marshal Vaillant, the Minister of War, had

* The 'whole rugged truth' would have comprised that 'escapade' of the 17th of June which was the proximate, and quite sufficient cause of the discomfiture Pélissier had suffered.

never, it seems, been regarded as amongst the most gentle of beings, nor as one born to soothe angry men; but the efforts he made to keep peace between the Emperor and Pélissier, or rather to avert any violent, destructive explosion, were in all respects admirable, being animated by a loyal, patriotic desire to see well upheld the honour of the French arms, whilst also brought to bear with effect by a judgment and tact of the kind that perhaps might be hopefully looked for in an accomplished diplomatist, yet, this time, were found in a veteran soldier who had shared in the Moscow campaign.*

Marshal Vaillant, too, wielded a power that aided his endeavour to mediate. The 'feeling' of the army in France was then a partly occult, yet always dominant, force understood to be day by day ruling the fate of Louis Napoleon; and this force Marshal Vaillant was not only able to gauge, but also in some sort to sway. His words, therefore, acted with cogency on the mind of the Emperor, and in that direction accordingly he was able to press mediation with the weight that belongs to authority.

To Pélissier, on the other hand, the Marshal addressed himself in calming, persuasive words; and, although it is true, the fierce general was entreated to be more deferential to the Emperor, and even in some things more yielding, he yet found himself loyally sustained by the Minister

* Rousset; and, I may add that the high praise he bestows is fully sustained by the correspondence he has disclosed.

qualities of Marshal Vaillant.

The power
he wielded over the Emperor.

His tone towards
Pélissier.

CHAP. IX. of War. Nay, unless I mistake, one can read through the diction employed something like an assurance that, despite the sheer letter of the law, Pélissier's tenure of the command was resting, after all, on a basis—not sure, but still—rather more stable than the whim of Louis Napoleon. Pélissier was told that he had the full confidence of the French impersonal 'On'; and the circumstances were apparently such that this 'On' really meant something more than the personal Emperor—meant something indeed not unlike what men call 'the State,' so that virtually, the sovereign could hardly withdraw his general from the field and from the enemy's presence without first obtaining some sanction of a higher kind than his own unsupported will.

It is true indeed that the Emperor once came to a decision dismissing his contumacious general, replacing him by General Niel, and ordering his Minister of War to communicate this change to Pélissier; but he only, after all, gave occasion for one of those pranks which honest men, acting for the good of their country, are accustomed to play upon despots. Marshal Vaillant did so far obey as to despatch a letter to Pélissier in the terms commanded by the Emperor; but, instead of sending it by telegraph, as he had been ordered to do, he committed it to the railway, thus gaining a good deal of time for the object on which he was bent. Then, supported by General Fleury, he persuaded the Emperor to revoke his decision, and did this so quickly as to be able to stop—at Marseilles—the further flight of the letter he had sent off by mail to Pélissier.*

On the whole, one may say that the too often threatening rupture between the Emperor and his general at the seat of war was always fended off by the Minister in time to avert public mischief.

Whilst thus achieving an object of vital moment to France, and, through France, to the whole Alliance, Marshal Vaillant, moreover, found time and gracious, considerate words as from comrade to comrade, with which, in so far as he could, to soothe the wounded feelings of Niel whilst suffering under the treatment remorselessly inflicted upon him by a furious Commander-in-chief.

However foolishly wielded, a Government of the sort called despotic in form may long maintain an appearance of something like competency by the simple expedient of selecting facts meet for disclosure, and hiding all its worst nonsense from the eye of the world. It was only after the fall of the second French Empire, and even indeed of Thiers (who was averse from disclosures he thought detrimental to France), that the antagonistic relations which long had severed the Emperor from his general in the field became known to more than a few.

Long concealment of the truth by the French Government.

* Rousset, vol. ii. pp. 292, 293. The inchoate dismissal of Pélissier took place after the close of the period with which this Narrative deals, but is mentioned nevertheless, because not fairly separable from my previous account of the relations between Louis Napoleon and his general.

CHAP.
IX.

Péliſſier;
his distinct individuality;

Without casting even one glance beyond the set bounds of this narrative, we have been able to see that the resolute Norman, Péliſſier, was a man of other mould than the one in which France, since the Great Revolution, has commonly shaped down her people.

No man even in our own rugged Isles ever held his own better against effacing tendencies than did this strong wilful Norman. His idiosyncrasy bristled with a sharpness incessantly proving that he was Péliſſier, intensely Péliſſier, Péliſſier plainly abounding, with faults and gifts all his own.

his great worth as a statesman upholding
the great Alliance;

What, however, we here have to mark is his wealth in those qualities—honour, wisdom, the half-divine faculty of entering into the motives of others—which make a loyal ally. As was natural, he on some questions differed from Lord Raglan; but except during one little interval of twelve or fourteen hours, when the torments inflicted upon him by the electric wires had impaired for the time his self-command and his judgment, he always, so far as I know, was doing his best to maintain the great Alliance. From the miserable state into which the Alliance had fallen before his accession, Péliſſier raised it to one of real cordiality, and thus gave signal proof that he had some at least of the statesmanship which we have seen to be more or less needed for the guidance of commanders in almost all great modern wars.*

* The Prussians in 1870 gave outward expression to this

And again, in a very different way, Pélissier CHAP.
IX.
found himself called upon to take the main part in a strife which, though falling to the lot of a commander in the midst of raging war, was still in its nature a strife between statesmen between a sovereign claiming full right to direct a campaign from afar, and a general in the enemy's presence declining to be bound by any such god-like prerogative. It was in resistance to this pre-tension that Pélissier served France, served her army, and served the Alliance with high courage, with unfailing resources of mind, and, above all,
immense strength of will.

and resisting his Emperor's interference in the conduct of the war;

From almost the time of its opening in the last century, the undying French Revolution had often enough been presenting some new and strange phase to the eyes of astonished Europe; and the last of these novelties was a man on a throne called 'the Emperor,' neither bred to arms, nor gifted, so far as men knew, with any warlike capacity, yet not only enabled by letter of law to command the commanders of his armies and fleets, but determined to use his power in the Eastern war, and possessed, besides, with a notion that, acting in person, he could victoriously direct a campaign; or, if prevented from joining his army in a far-distant region, could still give it sure means of conquest by sending out his com-believe, when they brought with them into the thick of the war their king, their war minister (Von Roon), and their Bismarck. Have the French any Bismarck in readiness to send with headquarters in their next campaign?

CHAP. mands in letters and messages from the West to IX. the East of Europe.

Whatever alarm might be raised by the prospect of a Louis Napoleon appearing in the Crimea, there seemed to be fair ground for hope that his contact with realities, the influence exercised over him by his surrounding generals, and his natural awe of Lord Raglan, would so far awaken him as to check his pursuit of dreams.

And again, when abandoning his project of going out to the Crimea, he resorted to the plan of conducting the war by letters, the French army, as we know, was in some sort protected from its sovereign by intervening distance ; since lapse of time passing between the writing and the arrival of his missives allowed room for such change of circumstances as might warrant or excuse disobedience to imperial mandates.

But when in the beginning of May electricity overcame distance, and thenceforth the unfortunate Canrobert on the Chersonese began to get pelted with orders despatched the same day by his master, the peril became acute, and was followed at once—not indeed by an actual and disastrous defeat in the field, but—by that recall of the expedition to Kertch (when already near the end of the voyage) which brought what the French call ‘a Ridicule’ on France, and through her, on the Great Alliance.

The cup was then full ; and, General Canrobert, in confusion and misery, withdrawing from the command, his successor (Pélissier) entered on that task of steadfast resistance to a dangerous sovereign which we have seen him maintain with high courage, though not without being so harassed by the difficult strife as to lose for a while the full command of his judgment.

CHAP.
IX.

With respect to Pélissier's power as a commander in war, one of course must beware of founding conclusions too general on the merits and faults he disclosed within the time spanned by a narrative which ends with the 28th of June; for he then, as all know, was only in mid-campaign with a critical future before him.

From the moment of his acquiring an extended authority—and this occurred some weeks before his becoming the Commander - in - chief — he brought an immense strength of will to bear on the course of the war.

Far away from the Crimea, in the autumn of 1854, he had never of course shared the counsels which nailed victorious armies to ground on the south of Sebastopol, and his sense of not having created the wondrous predicament which, coming out some months later, he found closely fastened upon them, may have made it the easier for him to study with coolness the problem demanding solution.

Of all solutions, the ugliest was the one asking France and England, after hugely increasing their forces, to incur the needed sacrifices of life, however appalling, and carry the South Side by storm. To this conclusion, however, Pélissier came. He

CHAP. IX. considered that the 'siege,' if so called, of an uninvested fortress was substantially a protracted battle with Russia, and that, to march troops away from the fight with instructions to begin, and to execute another campaign in another region, would be to run after 'adventures,' and violate the recognised principles which govern the art of war.

He acted up to his faith with a terrible energy.

In the last days of April and the beginning of May, whilst still only commanding a corps, and again three weeks afterwards, when placed at the head of the army, he attacked, as we saw, the Town counter-approaches, and carried them after incurring heavy losses of men. On attaining the supreme command, he hastened to wipe out the ridicule which Louis Napoleon's telegrams had brought on the Allies, and at once, in due concert with Lord Raglan, renewed the expedition to Kertch. Then he and Lord Raglan, co-operating, attacked the counter-approaches of the Karabelnaya, and carried them all; but the losses of the English were great, and those of the French enormous. Soon—brought about by the plague of Louis Napoleon's messages—there followed that interruption of Pélissier's sounder judgment which led him into several errors, and directly brought down on the Allies—French and English alike—the misfortunes of the 18th of June, quickly followed, however, by proof that the Norman was strong in adversity.

Pélissier in war did not seem to be a man caring at all for stratagems, ‘diversions,’ or feints. CHAP.

IX.
Revering the ascertained principles of the warlike Art, and keeping his mind in a state which ensured its consent (if his judgment so willed it) to terrible sacrifices, he instinctively sought to prevail by direct means, and by sheer force of character. His reluctance to bend aside from any design once formed had a tendency, of course, to prevent him from showing in action any nimbleness of mind; so that hardly on the spur of the moment would he seize newly found opportunities with the requisite promptitude, or alter at once any project, because of a sudden confronted by grave though unforeseen obstacles.

Men disposed to believe that the key to Pélissier's character was a firmness so rigid as to be verging on blind, mulish obstinacy, will find their theory met by the changes we saw him effect when under the schooling of adversity. But he even then clung to one of his errors—that of declining to assault the Flagstaff Bastion—with a sinister tenacity, not improbably sustained by the fact that Niel on that question held strongly an opposite opinion; and it still may perhaps remain true that the paramount quality of this fiery commander was, after all,—strength.

It was after the period covered by this account of the war that Pélissier won his renown—renown due to one who, if only reducing by siege-work one part of a fortress, had still done enough by great qualities to govern events, and bring a bloody war towards its close.

CHAPTER X.

LORD RAGLAN : HIS (OF LATE) SMOOTH RELATIONS WITH THE HOME GOVERNMENT.—THE AFFLCTION HE SUFFERED FROM THE DISAPPOINTMENT AND LOSSES SUSTAINED ON THE 18TH OF JUNE.—HIS VITAL STRENGTH APPEARING TO GIVE WAY.—HIS GRIEF AT THE LOSS OF GENERAL ESTCOURT.—A SLIGHTAILMENT AFFECTING THE CHIEF.

I.

CHAP. X. No tortures at all like in kind to those that Péliſſier suffered under the attempted dictation of his Emperor had of late been afflicting the English Commander-in-chief; and indeed one may say that, since the time when our War Minister abandoned the favourite object of obtaining Lord Raglan's assent to a change in the Headquarters Staff, our Home Government and their General in the field had been thinking and acting together in friendly, harmonious concert.<sup>(1)</sup>

The Home Government co-operating harmoniously with Lord Raglan.

Whatever his faults, Lord Panmure was not an ungrateful, was not a cold-hearted man, and having pointed out his offence of the 12th of February in the way that I did, I now gladly open some glimpses of the altered spirit and tone CHAP.

 in which he afterwards used to address the English Commander :—‘ I have just received your ‘ telegraph of yesterday. It gives me the great‘ est satisfaction, and I am sure we owe it to you
 ‘ and Lyons that our expedition against Kertch ‘ has sailed. The scheme from Aloushta I hold
 ‘ to be visionary, but I shall have full confidence ‘ in your decision.’ *

‘ I cannot help being alarmed lest the indecision
 ‘ of the French should cause some serious out‘ break here. Hitherto, our press has behaved ‘ better in that respect than we were warranted
 ‘ in expecting, but there is a limit to forbearance,
 ‘ and we are approaching to it.’ †

‘ He [Lord Ellenborough] will fall foul of you
 ‘ and all of us for certain, and we must try and ‘ meet him with an effective fire.’ ‡

‘ You shall find me strictly honest in taking all ‘ my own responsibility, and backing you and ‘ your army with all the esprit of a quondam ‘ soldado. . . . The resolve of the country is for ‘ war, or an honourable § peace, not such as Lord ‘ Grey and Milner-Gibson advocate, and for which ‘ I regret to hear Sir James Graham and Mr
 ‘ Gladstone are to speak and vote.’ ||

‘ I begin to incline to your opinion of the * Lord Panmure to Lord Raglan, 4th May 1855.

† Do., 7th May 1855.

‡ Do., 11th May 1855.

§ Underscored in the original.

|| Lord Panmure to Lord Raglan, 21st May 1855.

CHAP. X.
— — —
‘advance from Eupatoria. That from Aloushta
I always held to be visionary.’*

‘You cannot imagine how pleased every one is with the bloodless success at Kertch, and in the Sea of Azof. . . . I am longing for your despatch about the Bath, so that I may Gazette the batch at once. . . . You shall hear no more from me as to your Staff. I have told my colleagues that I acquiesce in your reasons for not submitting to a change, and that I will press it no further.† The complete success in the Sea of Azof has given immense satisfaction, and I am glad to find that you do not intend occupation by French or British troops.’‡

‘The Emperor is too much bent on commanding his army from Paris, and has, I learn, ordered the recall of his troops from Anapa, but which,
I trust, may not be listened to by his new Commander-in-chief in the Crimea. We are generally of opinion here, that you and Omar Pasha are right as to the movement from Eupatoria. . . . Would any of your Major-Generals wish to go to Malta? If so, send me a telegraphic message, and I will try and manage it for them.’§

‘You spoil us by giving us a victory almost daily, and your last exploit in taking so many outer works from the enemy is indeed most gra-

* Lord Panmure to Lord Raglan, 28th May 1855.

† Do., 1st June 1855. The last sentence, though quoted in a former volume, is here intentionally repeated.

‡ Do., 4th June 1855.

§ Do., 8th June 1855.

tifying. I may, however, tell you privately that CHAP.
I suspect these actions of the French, attended X as they are by serious loss, are far from giving the Emperor the satisfaction which they ought
. . . . I have no doubt that you knew far better than he or we do how to take Sebastopol in the shortest time, and with the least sacrifice of our precious men. . . . The subject of Cholera, on which you have no notion how I have been pestered by every description of bore. Between ourselves Palmerston is naturally nervous for the army, and listens too much to people. Then come those who think they are entire controllers of cholera, and every other disease under the sun. Then the homœopaths insist on their nostrums. In short, all are alarmed, and insist on sending advice.*

The rapid tide of success which has poured in upon us has put down grumbling. . . .
The papers sent home by you, and dating from 7th May, have given us an insight into your own proceedings, which you have done yourself injustice by withholding so long. I appreciate your good-natured motives, but I think you ought to consider yourself a little more, and your associates a little less. Make your communications as secret as you choose, but hide not your own light under a bushel. . . .
However, it is easy to wage war on paper, and I rely on your local resolves as being by far the best for action. . . . He [the Emperor]

* Lord Panmure to Lord Raglan, 11th June 1855.

CHAP.
X. ' will press Péliſſier to invest [Sebastopol], and ' may soon issue such stringent orders as shall ' place Péliſſier in the dilemma of having to ' choose between his master's orders and his own
 ' conviction. We shall do all we can to prevent ' this.'*

' The result of this failure on the part of the ' French will have very bad effects on the Em' peror, and lead him, I fear, to issue some fetter-
 ' ing orders to Péliſſier which may annoy him and ' embarrass the future plans of both of you. He ' is singularly low † at present; and, as he has
 ' a tendency to depression of spirits you can make ' allowance for his style of communication when
 ' in that condition.'‡

More and more, indeed every day from almost the first, Lord Panmure felt the safety, the comfort, the happiness of moving in the light of that guidance that reached him with every mail, with every electric message from the English Headquarters—guidance not, it is true, often given in the actual, set form of advice, but rather conveyed or instilled by the general tenor of the despatches and letters. To be receiving communications of this priceless sort twice in every week, * Lord Panmure to Lord Raglan, 18th June 1855. The date is a sermon against premature exultation. A defect in the working of the electric telegraph made it possible for Lord Panmure, when he wrote, to be congratulating instead of condoling.

† Underscored in the original.

‡ Lord Panmure to Lord Raglan, 23d June 1855.

and besides—since the first days of May—to be CHAP.
X.
hearing from Lord Raglan with the frequency and the speed ensured by an electric telegraph, was to have the surest clue there could be for dealing not only with the business of war, but also with those anxious questions which touched, or bordered on touching, the state of our relations with France.

The Home Government was more impatient of French shortcomings than their general in the field; but his wise and moderate despatches brought them always into accord with his own judgment. They seemed to hang on his words.

II.

Resulting in painful losses, and the blank disappointment of hopes which at one time, we know, had run high, the engagement of the 18th of June laid so heavy a weight of grief on the mind of Lord Raglan, that for once he failed to throw it aside, and even confessed to our Government the bitter affliction he felt.*

Lord Raglan
afflicted by the disappointment and losses sustained on the 18th of
June

So accomplished a soldier as he, knew of course that assaults on strong places are always regarded as tentative, may have to be often repeated, and, when failing, are only 'repulses' far enough from importing 'defeat.' And again—at least under one aspect—he might comfort himself by reflecting on the admirable conduct of our troops.

Having witnessed the advance of Yea's column

* Private letter to Lord Panmure, 19th June 1855.

CHAP. X. with his own eyes, Lord Raglan was free to indulge a just pride when observing the valiant devotion of his officers and his men under what was a heavier trial than soldiers commonly meet; but every thought of this kind must have carried its sting; for in proportion to the gallantry and devotion of the troops and the sailors advancing against the Redan, was the anguish of seeing men of so high a quality mown down without power to reach the enemy, and—unhappily—mown down in vain.

Lord Raglan's vital strength seeming to give way.

The strain that had been put upon him.

What within less than a year he had endured and achieved.

Men entitled to speak of the effect produced on Lord Raglan, are wont to agree that under this latest trial, more visibly than ever before, his vital strength seemed to give way. They, some of them, however, believe that this trial, though heavy, was still only one out of many that long had been straining his powers of endurance, and straining them so much the more since he had always held in horror the notion of showing depression, or seeming to harbour care.

And, great in truth was the sum of what within less than a year Lord Raglan had borne and achieved.

The task of firmly, gently discomfiting St Arnaud's early intrigues; the Cholera and the other fell maladies so fastening on our troops in Bulgaria, that even of those out of hospital none remained, it was said, in full health;

The dubious orders from Paris, the positive orders from London to cross the Black Sea, and at once invade the Crimea;

Lord Raglan's reconnaissances of the enemy's CHAP.
coast, and his choice of the landing-ground; K

The embarkation; the protest in writing of French officers; divided counsels at sea; Lord Raglan on board the Caradoc obeying his Government, and (with Lyons) forcing on the invasion; the Armada off Eupatoria and the coast further south;

The landing; the Cholera with all its fell company of maladies still pursuing our army; the march, grand to see, but performed by troops still more or less suffering from bodily weakness, and not indeed regarded as strong enough to be charged with the weight of their knapsacks;

The Alma, with at first for the Chief troubled, anxious, and harassing messages from French commanders; but then the strange inspiration which gave him—and within a few minutes—his sudden control of the battle;

The wounded, the dead, the too plenteous sorrows that gather in even the hour of victory;

The Heights overlooking the Belbec, overlooking the North or Star Fort, and beyond, nothing less than Sebastopol;

The valley of the Belbec, alluring to the eyes of the weary, with its gardens and vineyards, and groves, but unhappily there, and in numbers appallingly great, our troops falling stricken by Cholera;

The French army brought to a halt with the Star Fort before it, and, owing to St Arnaud's illness, left palsied for want of a chief;

CHAP.

---

X

Lord Raglan undertaking the, if faulty, yet romantic Flank March, involving a farewell for ever to the Western coast of the Crimea and a movement, guided by compass, over uplands and forests and plains all still in the enemy's power, and thence on to the southern shores of the Peninsula, where also the enemy was holding full sway;

Lord Raglan by sheer chance impinging on the ill-guarded rear of what proved to be a whole Russian army led by Prince Mentechikoff in person, and then easily taking possession of the Mackenzie Heights—Heights afterwards coveted with the passionate desire of great nations, yet never again to be reached by the invading armies;

The descent to the Tchernaya, and the march next day for that desired Southern Coast which people only knew of by maps; the march over a plain that seemed bounded southwards by a vast wall of hills with a small pool of water beneath them, but no visible sea, no visible opening, and soon, a highly perched fort, making bold to assail Lord Raglan with discharges of shell; then, however, mighty ships' guns heard roaring from behind the hills, and making all know that not only the sea, but Lyons himself must be there;

Pernicious dreams bringing the invaders to 'besiege' the then defenceless Sebastopol, instead of picking it up as a prize fairly won on the Alma;

The beginning of siege-work;

The 17th of October, a day fraught at one time with glowing hopes, and destined to exhibit not only the spectacle of French and English fleets striving to aid the land-service attacks, but also the ruin of Todleben's defences in the Karabel-naya broken up by our siege-guns; all turning, however, to naught, because a French magazine had before been blown up by a shell, and Canrobert required a postponement that was only to last two days, yet lasted several months;

CHAP.
X.

The battle of Balaclava, resplendent and tragic, including Scarlett's great charge with the Heavy Dragoons—an achievement still growing in fame—and the wild mistake that laid open a path of self-destruction and glory for the Light Brigade under Lord Cardigan;

The great battle of Inkerman famous for the ascendancy of the resolute few over hugely gross numbers—a battle mightily swayed, and (according to Mentschikoff) won by a measure which, though called 'impossible,' Lord Raglan proved able to execute;

The storm of the 14th of November and all its distressing results;

The 'winter troubles' that followed—troubles even comprising the ill conduct of two successive English Governments, and almost, of England herself, towards their general in the field;

General Canrobert disclosing a spirit that seemed to threaten disunion; General Airey's negotiation and its results in change of plan, and changed positions of troops;

CHAP.
X.

The vigour of the enemy beginning his counter-approaches in the teeth of the French;

General Canrobert, after one baffled effort, submitting to these bold aggressions with unexhausted patience;

The French army held back by a clog not plainly discerned at the time; but, as now we know, fastened upon it by Louis Napoleon;

During several months, the Emperor and the Emperor's plan sitting heavy as heaviest nightmare on the Allies, and staying the advance of the siege;

The April bombardment, a mighty and well-executed preparative for ultiarior action, not, after all, destined to follow;

Caused in part by the Emperor's pressure, and in part by a too anxious temperament, the faltering of Canrobert carried to strange extremes;

The 1st Kertch Expedition; and, in sight of astonished Europe, General Canrobert (under torture applied by Louis Napoleon) recalling his troops and his ships from off the Kertchine Peninsula;

Lord Raglan's indignation, his sternness, his venturesome grant of authority empowering Sir George, if so minded, to remain unaltered in purpose by the secession of the French, and go on with his English alone;

The now rising authority of Péliissier, and his fiercely warlike resistance (rather suffered than authorised by Canrobert) to the latest of the counter-approaches; the resignation of Canrobert, CHAP.

and Pélissier in command of the French;

---

X

Pélissier inaugurating his accession by hard, victorious fights; his entire accord with Lord Raglan;

A renewal of the Kertch expedition, resulting in the conquest of all the lands worth occupation in the Kertchine Peninsula, in the conquest and opening of the Cimmerian Bosphorus, the establishment of full dominion in the previously closed Sea of Azof, and the expulsion of the Czar from his two last remaining strongholds on the Circassian coast;

The Emperor and Pélissier directly opposing each other, one commanding again and again with dogged persistence, the other meeting dictation with flat disobedience supported by a fierce strength of will;

The victorious attacks of the 7th of June;

The discontent of the Emperor still 'galvanically,' as the victim expressed it, tormenting his distant general, and then the ill-omened 'eight days' interrupting Pélissier's command of his warlike faculties, and fraught with the mischiefs that followed in simply natural order;

The fell return of Cholera—striking down the brave Admiral Boxer, assailing too General La Marmora*—and of dysentery and fever to the camps of the Allies;

And, always meanwhile going on from October to June, the siege, the siege, the siege—to re-

* The brother of the Sardinian Commander.

CHAP. member the course of events brought back, as it were, by the sound—the once familiar sound—of mere loosely strung words such as these, is to have some idea, though a faint one, of the strain undergone by Lord Raglan within the last year.

Yet this only one epoch in a glorious life.

Yet, this campaign—brilliant and troubled—was, after all, only one epoch in a glorious life that, during the eight closing years of our war against France and Napoleon, the then youthful Lord Fitzroy Somerset had passed at the side of Wellington—a life that ‘bore on its colours’ (as soldiers say of a regiment) the names of Rolica, Vimieira, Talavera, Busaco, Fuentes d’Onoro, Ciudad Rodrigo, Badajos, Salamanca, Vittoria, Pyrenees, Nivelle, Nive, Orthez, Toulouse, and Waterloo.

There is therefore in known, outward circumstances some part at the least of a basis on which one might rest a belief that, long before Lord Raglan encountered the disappointment and losses sustained by Péliſſier and himself in assaulting the works of the Karabelnaya, care—the care of the war—had been sapping his vital strength. True, one does not at first very easily learn to believe that he who ever had seemed to be meeting the trials of war with a nobly buoyant spirit, he who only a few hours before had—almost blameably—chosen to plant himself—at first with one other, and then all alone—within the scope of that torrent of grape-shot and balls which Colonel Yea’s column was meeting, should all the while have been one on whom care had

The better that care had been sapping his vital strength.

fatally preyed; but the animating emotion of combat may have naturally masked for the time any symptoms of undermined health; and besides, it is hard to understand how the Chief, if indeed what he had seemed, and therefore strong as strong iron whilst confronting the enemy's fire, could presently, at the thought of his losses in killed and wounded, become all at once a changed man—a man not indeed stricken with illness of any ascertained kind, nor even so heavily grieving as to be robbed of the power to maintain his grand air of cheerfulness; but losing nevertheless that inner, that subtle force which is the mainspring of health and of life.

On the whole, one, I think, may agree that care had long since been weighing on the mind of Lord Raglan and slowly undermining his strength.

A falling off in the signs of good, vigorous, general health which his looks had hitherto shown was remarked by men at Headquarters; * The change in his outward appearance. yet there, it is plain, such a change might less strongly impress the observers who were constantly near their Chief than one who only saw him at intervals. On either, I believe, the 19th or the 20th of June, an officer of the Coldstreams came up to Headquarters, and there transacted business with the Chief. After quitting him, the Colonel found himself in company with some of the staff, and what he said to them will convey an idea of the impression his mind had received.

* Letters from Headquarters, vol. ii. p. 361.

CHAP.
X. He said:—‘Do you not see the change in Lord Raglan? ‘Good God! he is a dying man.’*

III

Lord Raglan affected by the death
of General
[redacted]

A fresh sorrow awaited the Chief. His Adjutant-General—Estcourt—a man greatly loved by Lord Raglan, by all his friends at Headquarters, and indeed by all who knew him, had been seized by Cholera on Thursday the 21st of June, and on the following Saturday, until evening came, he lay in a critical state; though the able medical officer (Dr Fowle Smith) who had watched him with ceaseless care was entertaining strong hope that the remedies employed would bring on the reaction desired. Then, however, there broke from a summer sky, not observed to be angered before, the extraordinary thunder-storm of the 23d of June, carrying with it great torrents of rain;† and the swift atmospherical change implied by an outburst so violent extinguished at once every hope of bringing about a reaction in the state of the patient. Estcourt died the next morning.

The grief of Lord Raglan was excessive, and his undermined bodily strength prevented him from keeping his feelings under rigid control.

Some who knew what Lord Raglan suffered

* I quote from memory of what the Colonel told me; but—having been much impressed—I can hardly be wrong as to the main purport of what is given in the text.

† These by suddenly flooding ravines caused, it seems, several deaths.

from the loss of his friend have even said that his grief was, in some sense, the cause of what followed; but perhaps they rather meant that the death of General Estcourt was the last of many sorrows and cares that, taken together, had sapped the vital strength of their Chief.

CHAP.
X.

IV.

On the 23d—the day of the singular storm—
23d June.
Lord Raglan
unwell;
but not prevented from transacting laborious business;
 Lord Raglan was unwell, but not prevented from transacting laborious public business. Thus on the same day (the 23d) he addressed to the Secretary of State four despatches, comprising altogether a great amount of careful, elaborate statement, and besides, wrote to Lord Panmure a long private letter dealing with several matters of business, and amongst others, with the subject of recruiting. On the same day, he visited his troops in the front. He moreover inspected the hospitals, looking specially to the wounded men, and, in fact, went through much of the labour that would have fallen to the lot of the Adjutant-General, if not then stricken by illness. Towards evening also, he went to the hut of General Estcourt, and saw him for the last time.
and not confined to his house.

On Sunday the 24th, Lord Raglan proposed a meeting for that same day with the French commander; and—replying to words of affectionate anxiety that had sprung from the heart of Pélissier upon hearing of his colleague's indisposition—he wrote lightly, saying that the ail-

CHAP.
X.

ment was nothing serious.* On the same day, he went through the conference he had sought with Pélissier—one perhaps that to him may have seemed more difficult, more full of peril than any he had yet undertaken. At a later hour, he wrote to Pélissier, sending him a translation in French of the Memorandum demanding great changes in the conduct of the siege to which we shall soon revert.

On the 25th, Lord Raglan was preparing to attend the funeral of General Estcourt when he found himself so much overcome—not by illness, but grief—that—perhaps hardly thinking it fit to show emotions so strong in the presence of troops—he remained for the time within doors. In the evening, he however went out and visited the tomb of his friend. On the same day, he reported the death of General Estcourt to the Secretary of State, and not only advised the Government on the choice of a successor, but fully stated the grounds on which he recommended Colonel Pakenham for the vacant post.

After the arrival on the same day (the 25th) of a despatch from the Secretary of State of the 11th of June, Lord Raglan dealt keenly with a curious suggestion it contained, and wrote with his own hand a minute recording the judgment he had formed.

Thus the indisposition which showed itself on the 23d of June did not either prevent Lord Raglan from attending to public business, or confine him to the house ; and what I learn is that it ceased. The statements before me do not treat the subsequent illness as one connected at all with the passing ailment experienced on the day of the storm, but rather with those grave signs of breaking health and strength which were marked, as we know, by keen eyes at a somewhat earlier time.*

* "Rien de grave."

CHAP.
A.

* See note, p. 265.

CHAPTER XI.

CONTINUING SIEGE OPERATIONS.

CHAP.
XI.

The French
sapping
more closely up to the works in the Karabelnaya;

and preparing to establish new batteries on ground
commanding the Roadstead.

The English
strengthening their hold of ground
captured
by Eyre;

FROM the engagement of the 18th of June to the close of the following ten days (when this narrative comes to end), the Allies and the Russians alike went on with their works of—respectively—siege and defence, continuing much as before to repair, to improve, to augment their respective batteries; but soon, the toils of the French began to take such a shape as to disclose Pélissier's intention of sapping up more and more closely to the enemy's ramparts in the Karabelnaya, whilst also showing him minded to establish new batteries on ground commanding the Roadstead, and so prevent the enemy's war-vessels from renewing attacks of the kind we saw made on Mayran's Division.

Amongst the toils of the English was that of fastening on part of the ground we saw won by General Eyre on the 18th of June; and they did this with skill, not choosing for instance to occupy the graveyard comprised in his conquest, but maintaining their control of the ground by means of troops so entrenched near, as to be able to guard it by fire without being meanwhile exposed to the countless guns of Sebastopol.* The great efforts made by the enemy to recover the ground he had lost in this part of the field seemed to show that Eyre's conquest was a greater misfortune to the garrison than our people had supposed it to be. Towards the close of the ten days that followed the 18th of June, our people handed over to Pélissier the charge of the ground they had won.†

CHAP.
XL

and afterwards handing it over to the charge of the French.

From the days when the mining and counter-mining began in the way we observed, and thenceforth down to the time which at last has been reached by this narrative, the subterranean warfare undertaken by the French and the Russians was maintained on both sides with great bravery, devotion, and skill; so that near me—pathetic, and teaching the vanity of human affairs—there stand or lie down (as they have stood or lain down through long years), grand folios, and—ampler in number—grand quartos, achieved with mighty labour and skill, and not only laying before me minute and authentic accounts of the battles that raged underground during several months, but elucidating the proffered lessons by numberless elaborate plans, and by illustrations—some of them coloured—so apt for their pur-

continuance of the mining and counter-mining operations

* As well shown by Pélissier in letter to Lord Raglan, dated 27th June 1855.

† On the 27th of June. Ibid.; and the answer to Pélissier despatched the same day by our Headquarters Staff.

CHAP. XI. pose as to have in them a kind of beauty budding out amidst things strictly technical.

But after that day in April when the French miners opened three chasms in front of the Flagstaff Bastion, and so provided the rudiments of a new parallel, the subterranean fights did not have such a visible and physical bearing on the course of events that they well can send down a narrator to the shades below in search of facts thought indispensable for a merely lay account of the siege.

The Russians, however, imbued with full knowledge of what they achieved in these arduous struggles, and trusting, besides, to the abundant and continuous accounts they received from French deserters, have maintained with full confidence that the energies of the counter-miner produced a moral effect which altogether upset the counsels of the French, drove them hurriedly into false paths, and long shielded the fortress from danger in what was its most tender part.

The moral effect attributed by the Russians to their vigorous counter-mining.

Why the French, having sapped their way up to close quarters with the Flagstaff Bastion, did not, after all, choose to assault it—this was naturally a question soon asked, and—till after the 19th of May—very easily answered by alleging the irresolution of Canrobert; but when the fiery Pélissier, having acceded to the command, was in this respect found to be following Canrobert's example, and when, after a while, he not only declared his resolve to abstain from assaulting the work, but even conducted himself with strange violence against a general officer who ventured to submit a contrary opinion, the question that before had seemed easy became one much harder to answer. We saw the solution of this lasting mystery which Lord Raglan accepted—one importing that, if the French soldiery should break by force into the town, they perhaps might become uncontrollable—but another explanation has been always preferred by the Russians. What they have said is, that the energy, the skill, the success of their counter-miners, soon fastened on the minds of the French soldiery a full conviction that the Flagstaff Bastion had been carefully mined, and that the dread thus felt by the men forced its way upon the counsels of their chiefs.

CHAPTER XII.

LORD RAGLAN'S INSISTENCE ON CHANGES IN THE PLAN OF THE SIEGE.

CHAP. XII WITH a keener sense than all others of the danger that lay in such paths, but seemingly urged by convictions which forced him to encounter the risk, Lord Raglan had already insisted on changing that part of the siege-plan which threatened to renew a great error, and summon his people once more to assault the Redan without being at the same time assured that the Work on its right, that is, the Flagstaff Bastion, would be similarly attacked by the French.

Memorandum
of the 21st of June.
Sent to
the French
Head-quarters.

It was under the form of a Memorandum prepared by our Chief Engineer, and then 'forwarded' to General Niel at the French Headquarters' that, so early as the 21st of June, the changes in question were broached.*

First suggesting that the counsels submitted to the Generals-in-chief for the taking of Sebastopol should be examined anew, the paper proposed nothing less than that the French should revert to their old design of pushing determined assaults against the town front of Sebastopol, and moreover declared that the English must at length give up as impracticable their only too long pursued task of besieging the Great Redan. The writer used very plain words, choosing even to say:—‘As an attack upon the Redan must be considered as abandoned, it remains to be decided what shall be the active part which the British troops shall take in the forthcoming operations;’* but what Lord Raglan believed to be much more surely attainable, and meant to press home on Pélissier, was only an engagement providing that, if the English Chief should consent to go on as before with his measures against the Redan, the French on their part would assault the town front, and in particular the Flagstaff Bastion.†

* Journal of the Royal Engineers, vol. ii. p. 830.

CHAP.
XII.

---

Even when thus reduced and confined in its scope, the English demand seemed to clash with Pélissier’s latest designs, but was based nevertheless on good grounds.

Since the time when Sebastopol — under the eyes of the besiegers — had become, step by step, a strong place, no reasoning strictly warlike could well have supported a scheme which directed against the Redan any real attack, still less any assaults uncombined with assaults of the Flagstaff Bastion;‡ and, although it is true that the objection to plans involving attacks on the Great Redan.

* Journal of the Royal Engineers, vol. ii. pp. 880, 881.

† See extract post, p. 277, from Lord Raglan’s despatch of the 23d of June 1855.

‡ On account of the nature of the ground as long before shown.

CHAP.
XII.

more especially of the Flagstaff
Bastion
were not to be then abandoned.

English undertook nevertheless to assail it, this was always, as Niel fairly owned, on the plain understanding that French attacks of the Flagstaff Bastion should go on hand in hand with the task assumed by our people;* so that, when, after the 10th of June, Pélissier chose to abandon his part of the twofold enterprise, there remained of course no ground at all for asking that the commander of English troops should engage to fling their strength from a distance against the Great Redan, whilst not only covered on its left by the still defiant Malakoff, but also on its right by a Work which, though ripe for attack with the bayonet, was for some reason, good or bad, to be spared from the final ordeal, and not to be stormed at all.

Assaults on the Re-dan from a distance out of harmony with the new French design.

And, Pélissier's latest resolve afforded yet one other reason against condemning our troops to adventure against the Redan any second assault. The ground in its front—rock thinly coated with soil—was of such a kind as to offer the English no prospect of ever proving able to drive their approaches close up to the Work; and therefore any endeavour to go on toiling against it was out of all harmony with the new French design—a design which, despite the huge losses entailed by such a resolve, aimed at pushing the siege-works close up to the counterscarps, before renewing attempts to carry the defences by storm.

On receiving the Memorandum of the 21st of * Niel's acknowledgment of this will be found post, p. 280.

June, General Niel did not think himself bound to impart its contents to his chief.*

Words from Lord Raglan showing the course he meant to take.

In one of the four despatches—the one marked 'Secret'—that Lord Raglan sent home, as we know, on Saturday the 23d of June, he said to the Secretary of State:—'General Péliissier has not yet announced to me his ultimate intentions as regards the assault of the place, and I fear he may still contemplate confining the attack to the faubourg, leaving the town itself unassailed, notwithstanding that he is fully aware that his own Engineer Officers, as well as those of the British Army, are satisfied that the more certain and readier way of success would be by assaulting the whole of the enemy's front. I shall take an early opportunity of conferring with General Péliissier, and will inform your Lordship on Tuesday what course he is disposed to take.'

The 'early opportunity' indicated was taken, as we saw, by Lord Raglan on the very morrow of the promise, that is, on Sunday the 24th of June, when, pursuant to his proposal, the two Commanders met. At their meeting, what questions were broached?

One of course was, the question which asked what Péliissier designed in the way of assaulting Sebastopol; † and it also is true that, when this

The Conference of the 24th held;

two of the subjects known to have been there brought forward,

* See Lord Raglan's note of the 24th of June to Péliissier, given post in footnote to p. 280.

† Because that was stated by Lord Raglan (see the above

CHAP.
XIL meeting took place, the English Memorandum of the 21st of June—one so strongly worded as to be almost peremptory in tone—was by Lord Raglan brought to the knowledge of General Pélissier.*

the grounds for anxiety they must have seemingly given

With such subjects as these brought before them, the discussion between the two Chiefs might well prove momentous, if not even pregnant with danger; for, unless by good fortune Lord Raglan should prevail over General Pélissier, he might find himself in a hateful dilemma, being forced perhaps in such case to choose between the ugly alternative of once more allowing our superb British troops and our ever-devoted sailors to perish in marching—not fighting—over hundreds of yards of ground swept by the guns of the Great Redan, or else—by holding back—to destroy or appear to destroy the long strained hopes of the French, and perhaps see the Great Allies met by a hideous course of events.

What passed
at the Conference?

What then was mainly the purport, and what the result, or the upshot of this anxious parley maintained between the two Chiefs?

This is what, as we know, Lord Raglan said he, ‘on Tuesday,’ would tell Lord Panmure.

On Tuesday, yes, Tuesday the 26th of June; but then on that Tuesday at the hour he assigned for the task, would this faithful servant of the extract from his despatch of the 23d June) to have been his object in seeking the Conference.

* Proved by words in the note from Lord Raglan to Pélissier, 24th June, given post in the footnote, p. 280.

State have strength to write what he had promised ?

CHAP.
XIL

The light till now thrown on my path by that entire series of despatches and private letters which Lord Raglan with unflagging constancy addressed to the Secretary of State, here, all at once, ceases to shine ; and I offer no account of the conference that passed between the two Chiefs.

*Abrupt ceasing of the light shed till now by Lord Raglan's
despatches.*

It was only, we know, at the head of an army almost small in comparison with that of the French that England in this anxious conference had met the strong-willed commander of one hundred thousand men ; but—represented then still by Lord Raglan—she had weight and strength of a kind that numbers will not always give.

*The position of England in conference of an anxious kind with the Chief of 100,000
men.*

Signs visible after the conference began soon to show that Lord Raglan's descendant, if it had not prevailed, was prevailing.

*Signs that Lord Raglan
was prevailing.*

The course he happened to take a few hours after the conference in sending to Pélissier (with a very cordial note from himself) a French translation of the somewhat blunt English Memorandum of the 21st of June seems not only to prove that the dangerous element of ill-humour was absent, entirely absent from the minds of both the Chiefs, and that even the explosive material of a sturdily worded Paper might safely be handled between them, but that also the negotiation begun in the morning was still on foot,

CHAP. and, in so far as appeared, had not undergone
XII. any check.*

Again, two days after the conference, the ancillary discussion maintained between the Chief French Engineer and the Chief Engineer of our army was not only continuing, but entering then on a phase highly favourable to the English contention,

Niel's Note of the 26th
of June.

Niel's answer was dated the 26th of June, and speaking so far with authority, because he had been privy to the arrangements of the 2d of February—he frankly made this acknowledgment:—
 ‘It has always,’ he said, ‘been understood that ‘the attack of the Redan was to proceed with that ‘of the Flagstaff Battery, so that the two sides of ‘the valley can be held, and that if the French ‘were to abandon their attack, the English, in ‘accordance with the previous conventions, would ‘on their side be free to abandon their attack of ‘the Redan.’ On the other hand, he insisted that, to propose the withdrawal of the English from their attacks would be almost the same as proposing to raise the siege.

The combined result of his two opinions im-

* The note from Lord Raglan above referred to was the last, I believe, that he ever sent to Péliéssier. It ran thus:—

‘DEVANT SEVASTOPOL, le 24 Juin 1855.

‘Je vous envoie, mon cher Général, la traduction du Memorandum du Général Jones en date du 21, dont vous avez pris connaissance ce matin.

‘Agrées, je vous prie, l'assurance de mes sentiments les plus affectueux et les plus dévoués.

(Signed) ‘RAGLAN.’

ported that, if the siege were to be continued at all, the English must go through with their measures against the Redan, and the French on their part must resume their former design of visiting the Flagstaff Bastion and its neighbours with determined attacks.*

CHAP.
XII.

Thus, so far as it touched the one question then meant to be pressed, Niel's counsel, or rather his testimony, was all in accord with the object pursued by Lord Raglan.†

I do not represent or imagine that the French Commander, if adverse to Lord Raglan's contention, would have suffered himself to be brought to an opposite conclusion by the words of his chief Engineer; for Pélissier, I believe, in such case would have felt much more strongly inclined to put Niel under arrest than to think of accepting his guidance; but, to write the Note of the 26th of June, and send it into our camp, was to make or record a surrender of the opinion lately held, lately followed in action by the French Commander-in-chief; and Niel—loyally—could not have suffered himself to take such a step, unless he well knew that Pélissier had yielded to Lord Raglan's demand.

The real conclusions deducible from Niel's answer of the 26th of June.

Until after the 28th of June, there did not occur any change in the seemingly better siege-prospect thus opened—for a while—to our army by Lord Raglan's firmness and care.

Continuance for some days of the better siege-prospects opened to our army.

All imbued with a knowledge of Lord Raglan's

* Journal of the Royal Engineers, vol. ii. p. 881.

† As shown ante, p. 274 et seq.

CHAP.

III.

Presumption that in this matter
Lord Raglan
must have seen his way

fixed opinion on the peril of ‘discussions’ with the French, will agree, I suppose, in believing that he would never have pressed, nor have suffered any other to press these sweeping demands on Pélissier, unless he had seen reason to think that they either were certain, or else in a high degree, likely to produce a result; and one even indeed must surmise that, when taking the step, he had either received some encouragement in that direction from his friendly, impetuous French colleague, or else had determined to be peremptory in requiring that, if ever his troops were to hazard another march under the batteries of the Great Redan, the French on their part must be ready to storm the Flagstaff Bastion.

Circumstances now enabling Lord Raglan
to act on Pélissier
cogently.

To act, and act cogently in that last direction, had, after the recent engagement, become a measure more clearly within the power of Lord Raglan than at any earlier time; for our Government and our people, when disciplined by the painful experience of the 18th of June, might be safely expected to support him in requiring that any new assault undertaken by our people should be an assault adventured under fair conditions; and on the other hand, Pélissier, weakened by his recent discomfiture, and the reckless outbreaks of will by which he had brought it about, whilst also ill-regarded by his Emperor and by many of the generals under him, stood more than ever in want of the shield he had so often used — the shield he always extended against unwelcome advisers, when able to meet them, by saying : 'Lord CHAP.

XII.
' Raglan and I are agreed.'

Having learnt on good grounds to infer that Lord Raglan could not have brought himself to press forward his object, unless having before him a prospect so good as to warrant the venture ; and considering that the halo of personal ascendancy, which distinguished him in the eyes of Pélissier from all other then living men, could scarce fail to give him great weight when undertaking persuasion ; whilst remembering too, on the other hand, that, if forced to speak or act cogently, he at all events had the command of a powerful lever, with, besides, all the knowledge and qualities enabling him to use it with skill, one may rightly believe that already he had won the assent of Pélissier to the change of plan he desired, and besides that the spell of his presence, if continuing to be felt in the camp of the Allied armies, would have fully ensured due persistence in the happily altered design.

On the other hand, we can see—see at least with the light of the Past—that none other than Lord Raglan himself could or would have the power to go on with the measure on which he had ventured ;* and accordingly, the hope that our troops would be either relieved altogether from their wrongly allotted task of attacking the Great Redan, or else find themselves enabled to attack it under fitting conditions, depended on the life of one man.

* Proved by experience, see post, p. 294 & seq.

Circumstances tending to show that Lord Raglan in this matter had before him a fair prospect of success.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE DEATH OF LORD RAGLAN.

CHAP.
XIII. PURSUING his labours as usual, Lord Raglan, on the 26th of June, addressed a despatch to the Secretary of State on several matters of military business. He spoke with great satisfaction of the excellence of the Hospital arrangements. Announcing the death of an officer who had succumbed to Cholera, and of another killed in the trenches, he furnished the Government with a statement of their respective merits and services. He spoke with natural sorrow of the increase of maladies affecting the troops, but treated the matter objectively, saying nothing of his own health. He framed this—the last—despatch with all his accustomed grace, and perfect clearness of style.<sup>(1)</sup>

The last despatch of Lord
Raglan.

This 26th of June was the 'Tuesday' which Lord Raglan had announced as the day when he meant to acquaint his Government with the result of the promised conference between himself and Pélissier; but before fulfilling the task, he felt unwell.

His ailment was probably faintness; for Dr Prendergast advised him to lie down. He did not feel equal to the effort of appearing at his dinner-table; but the doctor's report of his state was favourable.

The next day, the 27th, Lord Raglan's state not having improved, it was thought right to apprise the Home Government by telegraph that he was ill; but in the evening, a more favourable account was despatched.

Lord Raglan passed a tranquil night, and at the consultation which took place next morning, the 28th, between Dr Prendergast and two of our army surgeons, it was thought—at least by these last—that Lord Raglan was 'much better'; and a telegram to that effect was drawn up; but afterwards Dr Prendergast caused it to be modified, and the message sent home reported that Lord Raglan had passed a tranquil night, and was no worse.(*)

At about half-past three in the afternoon, Lord Raglan's servant came to Dr Prendergast announcing that his master was not so well as he had seemed to be a few moments before, and the doctor returning soon found that an alteration for the worse had taken place, though still he apprehended no immediate danger.

At half-past four o'clock, a sudden change came over Lord Raglan, and he was perceived to be sinking.

General Airey's affection for his Chief was deep, and at this dreadful moment strained His silently uttered words were

CHAP.
XIII.

anxiously into the future that lies beyond the grave.

General
Airey.

Approaching Lord Raglan closely, he said:—
 ‘Sir, you are ill; would you not like to see some one?’ Faintly and gently Lord Raglan answered, ‘No.’ General Airey still persisted, and said—said indeed more than once—‘Sir, you are very ill; would you not like to see some one?’ but the faint, gentle ‘No’ was still all the answer he drew. Then altering a little the scope of his question, General Airey said to him, ‘Sir, you are very ill; whom would you like to see?’ Lord Raglan gently answering, said, ‘Frank,’ meaning Lady Raglan’s nephew, Lord Burghersh.

His last hours and death.

The foreshadow of death was then falling on the mind of the Chief, and he did not, I believe, speak again.

Lord Burghersh presently came, but the consciousness of Lord Raglan had ceased.

Thenceforth, during some three hours, the commander lay breathing and tranquil on his narrow camp-bed; but, when the descending sun had at last sunk low in the heavens, a great life seemed to be waning with the waning of the day.

The Chaplain of the Forces was present;* and he has recorded what followed: ‘At this moment,’ he said and wrote, ‘I have before me one whom I had learnt to love, lying in his last moments upon a narrow camp-bed. The room was small and scantily furnished. Colonel Somerset and Lord Burghersh stood on one side of the bed, * Archdeacon Wright.

' Dr Prendergast at its head, Lady George Paget
 ' was seated at the foot, Colonel Steele and ' General Airey on the other side. I stood close ' to the dying hero. As I uttered the words,
 ' "Peace be to this house and all that dwell in
 ' "it," all fell on their knees, and I proceeded ' with the solemn order for the visitation of the ' sick. At the close of the heart - searching
 ' service, I placed my hand upon the forehead
 ' and commended the departing soul to the ' keeping of God, and scarcely had the last ' word passed my lips when the great man
 ' went to his rest. Colonel Steele then asked ' me to kneel down and pray that those present
 ' might be strengthened. I did so, and heavy ' grief sat upon the hearts of all who joined in
 ' that solemn appeal to Heaven.'(4)

CHAP.
XIII.

Many know, and some envy, the blissful look of content that lights on the face of a soldier when slain by a gunshot wound; but the toils of a commander are toils of the mind, of the heart.

The expression that fastened on Lord Raglan's countenance in the moment of death seemed to tell of—not pain but—Care.

Expression of his countenance
after death.

On the morning that followed, the Commanders-in-chief of the four Allied armies, and the Admirals of the fleets, and besides, General Canrobert (the late French commander) came up to the English Headquarters, and entered the chamber of death. Of these—all of course men

Generals
and Admirals next day in the chamber of death.

CHAP.
XII. of action, and nearly all used to encountering the painful scenes of war — there were none who without strong emotion could look on the face — now rigid in death — of him who but yesterday was their beloved, honoured colleague. They yielded to grief. Both the late, and the then actual, commander of the French army had been closely associated with Lord Raglan in the business of the war; and, as was natural, they all the more felt the anguish of seeing him lifeless.

Pelissier's agony of grief.

General Canrobert, having felt towards the English commander a strong affection, now mourned him with all his heart. But the general who grieved the most passionately, was he who had seemed to be emphatically the hard man of iron. Pelissier 'stood by the bedside for upwards of an hour, crying like a child.'*

Official announcements and condoleances.

On the same day, and issued by Lieutenant-General Simpson, then the senior officer present, the 'Morning General Orders' announced in simple terms to our army 'the death of its beloved commander Field Marshal Lord Raglan.'

From the structure of our administrative system as then constituted, it resulted that there were two high officers of State who, to meet an occasion like this, could legitimately give voice to the feelings of the Queen. 'I conveyed,' wrote the Secretary of State for our War Department, 'I conveyed your sad intelligence to the Queen. Her Majesty received it with profound grief.

* Letters from Headquarters, vol. ii. p. 363.

' Inform the army that Her Majesty has learnt
 ' with the deepest sorrow this great misfortune
 ' which has befallen the army in the loss of its ' late distinguished Commander-in-chief. The ' country has been deprived of an accomplished
 ' soldier, a true and devoted patriot, and an hon' ourable and disinterested subject.'*

CHAP.
XIII.

The other high officer of State charged to speak in the name of the Queen was her Commander-in-chief at the Horse Guards; and if men observe, as they will, that the Paper issued under his orders is not only written with power, and the kind of eloquence fitted for a warlike theme, but also with evident knowledge of the sway that Lord Raglan in person had brought to bear on the Alma campaign, they will remind themselves that Lord Hardinge was himself a great soldier of the Wellington days, and a conqueror in more recent times.

GENERAL ORDER.

\ Horse Guards, 4th July 1855.*

' The General Commanding-in-chief has received ' Her Majesty's most gracious commands to ex' press to the Army the deep regret with which ' Her Majesty has to deplore the loss of a most ' devoted and able officer by the death of Field-
 ' Marshal Lord Raglan, the Commander of the ' forces in the Crimea.

' Her Majesty has been pleased to command
 ' that her sentiments shall be communicated to * Promulgated to the Army, 2d July 1855.

CHAP.
XIII.

' the Army, in order that the military career of
' so illustrious an officer shall be recorded, not ' only as an honourable testimony of Her Majes' ty's sense of his eminent services, and the re' spect due to his memory, but as an example
' worthy of imitation by all ranks of her Army.

' Selected by the Duke of Wellington to be his ' Military Secretary and Aide-de-camp, he took ' part, nearly 50 years ago, in all the military ' achievements of our greatest commander. From ' him, Lord Raglan adopted, as the guiding prin' ciple of his life, a constant, undeviating obedi' ence to the call of duty.

' During a long peace, his life was most usefully ' employed in those unwearied attentions to the ' interests and welfare of the Army, shown by
' the kindness, the impartiality and justice, with
' which he transacted all his duties.

' When war broke out last year, he was selected
' by his Sovereign to take the command of the ' Army proceeding to the East; he never hesitat' ed—he obeyed the summons, although he had ' reached an age when an officer may be disposed ' to retire from active duties in the field.

' At the head of the troops during the arduous ' operations of the campaign, he resumed the early
' habits of his life; by his calmness in the hottest ' moments of battle, and by his quick perception
' in taking advantage of the ground, or the move' ments of the enemy, he won the confidence of ' his army, and performed great and brilliant
' services.

'In the midst of a winter's campaign—in a CHAP.
XII.
severe climate—and surrounded by difficulties
—he never despaired.

'The heroic Army, whose fortitude amidst the severest privations is recognised by Her Majesty as beyond all praise, have shown their attachment to their Commander by the deep regrets with which they now mourn his loss.

'Her Majesty is confident that the talents and virtues which distinguished Lord Raglan throughout the whole of his valuable life, will for ever endear his memory to the British Army.

'By command of the Right Honourable General Viscount HARDINGE, Commanding-in-chief.

'G. A. WETHERALL,

'Adjutant-General.'

So early as the day next but one to that of the Field-Marshal's death, the Queen was graciously pleased to address to Lady Raglan this letter:*

Private letter of condolence from the Queen to Lady Rag-
lan.

THE QUEEN TO LADY RAGLAN.

'BUCKINGHAM PALACE, June 30, 1855.

'DEAR LADY RAGLAN,—Words cannot convey all I feel at the irreparable loss you have sus-

* If I print this letter without having first asked for the writer's gracious permission, this is only because her Majesty at a former period allowed it to be published by Sir Theodore Martin. I may say that in this case I have not liked to render underscored words by a resort to italics. The words underscored by her Majesty are in the 2d line, 'all,' in the 6th line 'deeply,' and in the 22d line, 'we all'

CHAP.
XIII.

'tained, and I and the country have in your noble,
' gallant, and excellent husband, whose loyalty
' and devotion to his sovereign and country were ' unbounded. We both feel most deeply for you ' and your daughters, to whom this blow must be
' most severe and sudden! He was so strong,
' and his health had borne the bad climate, great
' fatigues, and anxieties so well ever since he left ' England, that though we were much alarmed at ' hearing of his illness, we were full of hope of his ' speedy recovery.

' We must bow to the will of God, but to be ' taken away thus on the eve of the successful ' result of so much labour, so much suffering, and
' so much anxiety, is cruel indeed! We feel ' much, too, for the brave army whom he was so ' proud of, who will be sadly cast down at losing ' their gallant commander, who had led them so ' often to victory and glory! If sympathy can be ' any consolation to you, you have it, for we all ' have alike to mourn, and no one more than
' I, who have lost a faithful and devoted servant,
' in whom I had the greatest confidence. We ' both most anxiously hope that your health and
' that of your daughters may not materially suffer
' from the dreadful shock.—Believe me always,
' my dear Lady Raglan, yours very sincerely,

(Signed) 'VICTORIA R.'

If her Majesty by the terms of her letter may seem to blend with her own, some other opinion, and one by her deeply valued, it will be borne in mind that the Royal Consort was versed in military business, had applied great care and thought to the subject of the then pending war, and had adopted the wise, wholesome practice of putting himself in personal communication with officers newly come from the East.

CHAP.
XIII.

But apart from sheer grief was the void. Relations between the Home Government and Headquarters going on without any Lord Raglan? The army without Lord Raglan? The Alliance without Lord Raglan? A letter, a note, or a message to the oftentimes raging Pélissier without a Lord Raglan to frame it? It is believed that, whilst Lord Raglan lived, and daily appeared in his saddle, no such painful casts of thought had been made—not made at least in grave earnest by any of our Generals, still less by the army at large, which had toiled and suffered and fought with unswerving devotion to its Chief, and had never so far looked beyond—not even for argument's sake—as to dwell on what might follow 'if ever 'the king were to die.'

The void caused by Lord Raglan's death.

None perhaps felt the void more acutely than did the brave, honest, unselfish officer on whom the command had devolved. The words he addressed to our Government are touching: After speaking of the troops and 'their beloved commander,' he added: 'His loss to us here is inexpressible. The sympathy of our Allies is universal and sincere. His [Lord Raglan's] name and memory are all that remain to animate us

This acutely felt by the officer who succeeded to the command.

CHAP. XIII. ‘in the difficulties and dangers to which we may be called.’

Immediate evil to our army resulting from Lord Rag-
lan's death.

Abrupt
abandonment of the negotiations he had opened with Pilatier.

Even then, whilst he spoke from the heart, he also could speak from experience—experience showing that England, by the death of her General, had been all at once robbed of her weight in the Anglo-French Councils of war.

We learnt what hope there was that, in compliance with a demand addressed to the French on the 21st of June, our troops would be either relieved altogether from their wrongly allotted task of attacking the Great Redan, or else find themselves enabled to attack it under fitting conditions, but also saw reasons for judging that the prospect of this happy change depended on the life of Lord Raglan.

The event of the 28th of June was pursued by its apprehended consequence with astonishing promptitude, for—even within a few hours of the English commander's death—our people gave up their demand, and submitted once more to that distribution of siege-work which was fated, as it had been before, to become a cause—plainly foreseen—of fresh disappointments and losses.<sup>(4)</sup>

Unable to divine other reasons for the extraordinary step of not only abandoning the resolve announced to General Niel on the 21st of June, but allowing themselves to declare this abandonment on the very morrow of Lord Raglan's death, I am led to believe that our military authorities must have acted in haste, whilst still suffering under the shock occasioned by the loss of their chief, though also perhaps from a sense that, without him, they could not well even try to pursue any further the question — admittedly anxious and difficult — which he had ventured to raise.

CHAP.
XIII.

For our people this break wrought by death in the wholesome, accustomed relations between their chief and Pélissier was a grave and lasting misfortune. The prospect awaiting our army depended, of course, on its having a rightly allotted share of the great warlike business in hand; and the exigencies of the Alliance made it plain that every such needed apportionment of combatant tasks must be concerted with the French chief. Yet he who alone among men had proved able in council to deal with the fiery Pélissier lay now in the chamber of death; and none coming after him knew how in treaty—in critical, perilous treaty—with the commander of 100,000 men to secure for our scantier numbers in the struggles to come a good, well-assigned fighting berth. In this way alone out of many, the death of the English commander brought down all at once on our army, and therefore of course on our country, a grave and abrupt loss of power.

Loss of weight in Anglo-
French
council, resulting from the death of Lord Bag-
lan.

Our country indeed, every day, was growing in strength—in material strength of the kind that is needed for war; but material strength, after all, is only one part of greatness. Amongst those who remember the period not one, I imagine, will say

C H A P. that from the heartrending sunset of the 28th of
XIII. June to the close of our war against Russia, the England of that time seemed equal to the England of those prior days when she still had the honoured commander of the Alma campaign to represent her in council, to represent her in arms.

One more year of life and of health vouchsafed to Lord Raglan must have seemingly altered, and altered in a happy direction, the subsequent course of events.

The sorrow of our troops.

The sorrow of our troops was proportioned to the unswerving attachment with which they had regarded the chief. It was seemingly on him, him alone, that they formed their ideal of what the true leader should be. When the new commander had braced himself for the labours before him, he frankly chose for his guidance the example of Lord Raglan. 'It will be the duty,' he announced, 'of the Lieutenant-General to follow 'in the steps of his great Predecessor.'

Order of Admiral
Lyons and our seamen.

In even our army there could hardly be found deeper grief than that which wrung the heart of our Admiral—Admiral Lyons—nor sorrow more true than that felt by the officers and seamen of our fleet, who had devotedly taken their part in effecting the descent on the coast near Old Fort, and in thenceforth pursuing the war both by sea and on shore with that joyous superlative zeal which few can even conceive unless they have seen naval officers with their men not only at work, but at work in the enemy's presence.

The Sardinian army, we know, had been under Lord Raglan's direction; and the feeling of these highly valued Allies was expressed by General La Marmora in his Order of the day. Whilst announcing to his troops that there had yesterday died 'the illustrious Commander of the English Army,' he spoke of the Field-Marshal's long career, the services he had rendered to his country, his 'heroic courage,' and his 'exemplary constancy' in times of trouble, and declared the loss of such a commander to be a 'great calamity.'

Omar Pasha showed his feeling towards the memory of Lord Raglan in the way we shall afterwards see.

We saw the phrenzy of grief which mastered the iron Péliſſier when he stood in the chamber of death; and afterwards, but on the same day, he issued this General Order—a paper long admired in the camps for its fervour and power:—

'ARMY OF THE EAST.—No. 15, GENERAL ORDER.

'Death has suddenly taken away while in full exercise of his command the Field-Marshal Lord Raglan, and has plunged the British in mourning.

'We all share the sorrow of our brave Allies. Those who knew Lord Raglan, who know the history of his life—so noble, so pure, so replete

CHAP.
XIII.

' with service rendered to his country—those who ' witnessed his fearless demeanour at Alma and
 ' Inkerman, who recall the calm and stoic greatness
 ' of his character throughout this rude and
 ' memorable campaign, every generous heart indeed,
 ' will deplore the loss of such a man. The ' sentiments here expressed by the General-in-' chief are those of the whole army. He has ' himself been cruelly struck by this unlooked-
 ' for blow.

' The public grief only increases his sorrow at ' being for ever separated from a companion-in-
 ' arms whose genial spirit he loved, whose virtues
 ' he admired, and from whom he has always re' ceived the most loyal and hearty co-operation.

(Signed)      ' A. PÉLISSIER,
                   ' Commander-in-chief.

' HEADQUARTERS, before SEVASTOPOL,
       ' 29th June 1855.'

Feeling of the French army generally towards Lord
Raglan.

Apart from the principle of 'representation' which entitled Péliſſier not only to speak for himself, but to speak, as he did, for the whole of his 100,000 men, it seems to be true—and the truth is one of high value in several questions of moment—that the bulk of the French army in the Crimea—and perhaps more especially its rank and file—had been long ago drawn towards Lord Raglan—at first with strong interest, and then—with a warm admiration, close followed by genuine trustfulness.

Amongst the French troops in the Crimea CHAP.
there had chanced to be none whose career XIII.
carried back into the thick of the last mighty war; whilst in each of its eight latter years Lord Raglan, though not greatly older than General Péliassier, had had the good fortune to be not only engaged, but engaged on the Headquarter Staff, and at the side of Wellington.*

Accordingly it was in the English commander alone that the French army saw a Chief linking them with the days of the Great Napoleon. They had never been dull to the eloquence of the blue empty sleeve, that told of the wearer's sword-arm lost at Wellington's side, lost even near 'La Haie Sainte,' and not far from the moment of moments when 'the bravest of the brave,' Ney himself, was victoriously storming the farm. Yet he who thus recalled to French troops the days of the great war was in no sense what people mean when they speak of a 'veteran.'

Not for him—ever busied with present duties—was there time or desire to dwell on the past. With his always sustained animation, his beaming attention to what others said, his prompt, terse reply, his easy grace in the saddle, his ready hand-gallop, he had not only seemed like a man who (for purposes of warlike command) was still in the prime of life, but to have the air of an officer whose habitual activity of body and mind

* The difference of age between the French and English commanders was six years, but in point of activity, Lord Raglan was immensely the younger.

CHAP. had been never at all interrupted by the languor XIII. of peace.

What soldiers now and then see of the bearing of Commanders observed to be conversing on horseback is not always without its significance; and when any such opportunities invited our Allies to form judgments of the quality of the English Commander, the keen-witted Frenchman could see that he held a great personal ascendancy, since other chiefs hung on his words, and seemed to be willingly governed, seeming also to be calmed and cheered by answers that fell from his lips.

But again, there is a spell in personal daring—where it chances to govern events—which carries the hearts of men. When Lord Raglan—not preceded, not followed by troops, but having seaman's blood in his veins *—cantered down to the Alma, and forded it, and rode on through the enemy's skirmishers, losing only two of his Staff, and at last crowned that knoll in the line of the Russian position where fortune gave him her welcome, he was under the eyes of French soldiers†. It could not but be that the story of what these men saw would swiftly spread through their camp.

To Pélissier's troops, the late English Commander, of course, had been by nation a foreigner,

* His mother was the daughter of Admiral Boscawen.

† Not the same bodies of French soldiers; for those who saw him ride down to the river did not see him in the cover beyond, passing through the enemy's skirmishers; and again, those who saw him in the cover or fording the stream, could not afterwards see him on the top of the knoll.

had been also 'the ancient enemy,'—had, moreover, been 'Grand Seigneur,' and therefore, they imagined, born foe of the Tricolor Flag; but—taught by the warlike Zouaves, who then used to govern opinion in the camp of the French—their rank and file—after debate—got to hold that, in spite of all this, Lord Raglan was the true man of men they would choose to lead them in battle.

CHAP.
XIII.

And now, when in mid-campaign, the hand of death struck down a Chief on whom they had thus set their hearts, the sentiment moving them harmonised with the judgment they had long ago formed of his prowess in strife at close quarters.

The family of Lord Raglan, desiring that this warlike scion of their House should rest at the last with his ancestry, the Authorities determined to convey his remains for embarkation to the port of Kazatch; and, the Generals allied with our own all demanding for themselves and their troops that the removal should be attended with full military honours in which they might take their part, it resulted that he who in life had carried to even a fault, his hatred of all forms and ceremonies attracting men's eyes towards himself, was in death to become the mute object—defenceless now against splendours!—of a homage bestowed by whole armies assembled for the purpose in strength, and assembled in the enemy's presence.

The mortal remains of Lord Raglan conveyed with military honours to the Bay of Kazatch.

Many pageants have borrowed adornment from the presence of troops, without, of course, ever ac-

CHAP. quiring by any such shallow means the least semblance of true warlike dignity. Here, however, the war and the pageant seemed linked hand in hand; for the myriads assembling to honour the memory of the English commander were not only troops under arms, but troops in mid-campaign, troops acting beneath the rapt gaze they drew from the enemy's watch-tower. The whole movement from east to west, though solemn and mournful, was all the while nevertheless a movement slowly effected across the front of Sebastopol, and of course under such conditions, the pageant might lead to a battle.

In seizing the occasion that offered for an outburst of honourable sentiment, in giving to those martial honours which Circumstance seemed to enjoin their largely extended proportions, in bringing the design to completeness, and—more than all put together—in animating the outward form of the ceremony with the—partly, it may be, poetic, yet not less genuine—fervour of their many tens of thousands of troops, the French army took a main part.

The Allied commanders provided that before 4 o'clock on the afternoon of the 3d of July, the whole road from the English Headquarters to the port of Kazatch—a distance of about seven miles—should be lined on each side by double ranks of infantry; that at intervals on both flanks there should be posted not only other troops, but bands of regiments as well as field-batteries, and that the duty of escorting the movement along its whole course should devolve upon twelve squadrons of cavalry, with three troops of horse artillery. From the English to the French Headquarters the infantry lining the road was to be furnished by a contingent of officers and men told off for this honour from every one of our regiments, and beyond, along the remaining distance of six miles, by the Imperial Guard of the French and the troops of their First Corps. In the courtyard of what had been Lord Raglan's house there stood the Guard of Honour, one furnished by the Grenadier Guards, with the drums and regimental colours. In the vineyards adjoining were placed the bands of three regiments.

CHAP.
XIII.

Making no other large exception than that of troops on duty in the trenches, or required for the safety of their camps, one may say that, to honour the memory of the English commander, the armed hosts of the Allies were assembled in all their martial splendour and strength.*

Met first by the roll of the drums from the Guard of Honour, then emerging from the court of the house under the outburst of sound that opened the solemn Dead March, and thenceforth passing always between the serried infantry lines under the booming of minute-guns, the darkly pall'd bier, covered over with the Flag of the Union, having on it the plumed hat and sword of * Sayer's Collection, p. 229.—The narrator, though official, still does not refrain from saying that the appearance of the troops was 'splendid.'

CHAP.
XIII. him who but lately had worn them, with also the garland of immortelles affectionately placed near the sword by the hand of Péliſſier, was slowly moved towards the west on a nine-pounder gun ; and beside the four wheels of the gun-carriage there rode the four commanders of the four Allied armies. Next—led by two mounted orderlies—there followed—saddled and riderless—Lord Raglan's favourite charger—the one, the brown bay, he had ridden in the battle of the Alma and throughout the dim Inkerman day.

After officers related to the Field-Marshal and the members of his personal Staff, the column of march included unnumbered Generals of the four Allied armies, with their respective Staffs, included the Staff of Headquarters, included the officers chosen to represent every branch of the English land service, with also every regiment, and besides, the Naval Brigade and the Royal Marines. Further details are covered or merged by only saying once more that the bulk of the Allied armies was assembled, and assembled in strength.

Whilst the mournful solemnity lasted, the French and the English engaged with siege duties in front refrained from inviting by fire the fire of Sebastopol ; and, whether owing to chance, or to a signal and graceful act of courtesy on the part of General Osten-Sacken, the garrison also kept silence.

Received at the wharf of Kazatch by Admiral

Bruat, by Rear-Admiral Stewart, and by a large concourse of officers from both the fleets, then placed in a launch—the launch of the English Flagship, which numbers of man-of-war boats lay ready to take in tow—then moved off from the shore under a salute of artillery, and borne thence with all naval honours, the bier at length reached the side of the vessel awaiting it, and was taken on board the Caradoc.<sup>(5)</sup>

CHAP.
XIII.

On board the Caradoc! The sound, the bare sound of her name, carried with it a heartrending contrast between the past and the present. In those eager days, only ten months before, when Lord Raglan, in concert with Lyons, was forcing on the Invasion, it used to be from the Caradoc—men saw her then constantly signalling—that the Chief exerted his power; and now the same vessel, still ruled by the same devoted commander, was receiving Lord Raglan once more, but receiving him only in death.

Soon, the Caradoc moved, and was gliding towards the mouth of the bay, when a flutter appeared at her mast-head which showed her to be speaking once more. As though in imagined communion with the honoured freight lying on board, beneath the Flag of the Union, she flew out the signal—‘Farewell!’

APPENDIX.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER I.

NOTE 1.—Allies of the Sultan.—This was done by bringing about the dismissal of Riza, the Minister of War, who was believed to have been always intriguing against Omar Pasha.—Lord Raglan to Secretary of State, Secret, 5th June 1855.

NOTE 2.—Fear'd to displease.—There is nothing in history more certain than this. At the fatal Cabinet of July 1870, the Emperor had actually congratulated his Ministers on the diplomatic victory that he had achieved by bringing about the withdrawal of the Hohenzollern candidate, and all seemed to promise both peace and contentment, when Lebœuf interposed, and pronounced that the avoidance of war (after all the excitement stirred up) would cause an ill feeling in the army.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER II.

NOTE 1.—Once more recaptured the Work.—That this was the ending of the fifth fight is asserted with precision by Niel (p. 254); and Todleben, with the statement before him, does not really and effectually deny it, nor substitute for it any narrative of a Russian victory. He indeed writes in one place as though he understood that the retreat of the French a little before dawn was a movement caused by their being 'worn out' (épuisé), but he elsewhere says in terms that the fifth fight resulted in a capture of the counter-approach; and, as he also shows that the fourth fight had left it in possession of the Russians, it follows that the fifth capture was a capture by the French.—Todleben, pp. 242, 243. On the whole, I can say that, with the accounts of Niel and Todleben before me, I entertain no doubt that the fifth fight resulted in a victory for the French.

Note 2.—*By first reducing the Malakoff.—I base my account of the foregoing occurrences detailed in this chapter upon the despatch of General Péliassier, and the official narratives of Niel, p. 250 et seq., and Todleben, vol. II. p. 226 et seq.; and having said thus much, I consider myself entitled to disclaim responsibility for the accuracy of the three generals whose statements I follow. I don't overload the dictum by saying in words at every sentence: 'according to Péliassier,' or 'according to Niel,' or 'according to Todleben,' but wish it to be understood that I do so in effect by means of this general indication.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER III.

Note 1.—*Investing the place.—This anterior purpose, as first declared by Péliassier, was only what one calls the 'repression' of the south side of Sebastopol. But he afterwards, as we have seen, insisted that its thorough conquest must be effected before resorting to field operations. After forming that last resolve, to which he always in action adhered, he once or twice wrote (inconsistently) as though the 'repression' might suffice.

Note 2.—*With scorn, and with victory.—No one ought to forget that, in principle, resistance to lawful authority is an evil of formidable magnitude; but in that grave dilemma with which Péliassier dealt, the alternative was one that would hazard a hundred thousand French troops in what, as the wisest men judged, would have been a fantastic campaign, involving perhaps cruel sacrifices, not only of men, but also of warlike honour. See post, Appendix, Note 9 to chap. IV.

---

NOTES TO CHAPTER IV.

Note 1.—*Destroyed them.—Todleben agrees, vol. II. p. 250, that out of the Kertch flotilla, three vessels were destroyed—viz., the Berdianek (as mentioned in the text), the Mogoutchy, and the Jouets, but it might be inferred from his language (though he does not say so in terms) that the Argonaut and the Gosta escaped.

NOTE 2.—For the protection of their lives and property.—The word 'Tartars' must have been used by the deputation in a specific sense, indicating some known band or bands of men supposed to be bent on pillage; for the 'Tartars' in the villages generally were at this very time giving shelter and kindly help to the frightened refugees from Kertch.—Ibid. General Todleben nowhere calls the men 'Tartars,' but always 'marauders.'

NOTE 3.—The pitiless screaming of women.—I have rightly spoken of the irruption of mounted Cossacks into a room as a fact of not unfrequent occurrence; but, as regards one particular instance of it, my informant, Sir Edmund Strelcski (phonetically, Strelecki), long the favourite of the London world, was one of those present. He was a lad at the time. After the famous retreat from Moscow, he was at an evening party going on upon the first floor when the Cossacks trotted up-stairs and rode into the drawing-room.

It was not without reason that the Cossacks used to keep their saddles when entering houses and rooms. They used to have plunder stowed on the backs of their horses, and feared that, if separated from them, they would be robbed of the spoil by their comrades.

In more recent times, the mounted Cossacks in the service of the State have been as much under control as the regular forces; and, although not yet famous for prowess in combat, they are made useful in numberless ways.

NOTE 4.—Meant to defend the place.—The summons demanded the surrender of—not the town, but—the Crown property. Whether General Kraenoff misread the summons, or only affected to have done so I do not know.

NOTE 5.—That shot last night perished.—Though accepted (through some inadvertence) by General Todleben, the story of a serious fight, and of bayonet charges, effected in defence of the stores, is altogether a fable.

NOTE 6.—Harm to the town.—The story accepted by Todleben, of allied attacks made on some vessels that had sought refuge in the Gulf, and of the assailants having been beaten off by Kostrakoff with his Cossacks, is fabulous; not one man of the Allies, on the 5th of June, was either killed or wounded.

NOTE 7.—To refrain altogether from sending it.—Rousset, who had access to the papers at the French War Office, imagined that the Emperor's telegram had miscarried or been made to miscarry; but that, as we see from the text, was not the case. From the blank at the French War Office, coupled with the actual result, my surmise, put out under cover of a 'perhaps,' may derive some support.

NOTE 8.—His sovereign's imperious mandate.—Rousset, who had access to the papers in the French War Office, states that the Emperor's telegram was inexplicably delayed in transmission from the 3d to the 8th of June. This, of course, was an error, because we know that Pélissier imparted the telegram to Lord Raglan on the 6th; but the statement, though erroneous in its conclusion, seems to show that down to the 8th no answer had come from Pélissier to the telegram of the 3d of June.

NOTE 9.—Proved able to set him aside.—The resistance of a general to the authority of the State is, of course, a grave matter, and cannot be justified on light grounds, but, as Pélissier retained his command, one, I think, may observe what passed, without being forced into the question of clemency which presents itself when a general's disobedience breaks up his relations with the State.

NOTE 10.—Protest against every such measure.—'Je suis heureux qu'elle ait réussi; mais néanmoins je ne puis m'empêcher de considérer comme fatal tout ce qui tend aujourd'hui à disséminer vos forces.'—Emperor to Pélissier, 30th May 1855. The under-scoring of the word 'fatal' was an act of the Emperor.

NOTES TO CHAPTER V.

NOTE 1.—Havoc and ruin.—'Mais le comble du dommage auquel cet ouvrage était exposé lui venait des batteries Anglaises qui savaient compenser la mesure un peu lente de leur feu par la précision remarquable de leur tir.—Todleben, vol. ii. p. 310.

NOTE 2. Accepted the Prince's bold story.—The French say distinctly that after capturing the Work they spiked its guns (Rousset, vol. ii. p. 235); and Todleben also admits this, as also that the embrasures were destroyed, saying that he himself ordered the guns to be unspiked and the embrasures to be repaired, vol. ii. p. 330. I suppose Prince Ouroussoff would hardly maintain that the destruction of the embrasures and the spiking of the guns could have been coolly effected at the time of his 'bayonet' charge.

NOTE 3.—Respecting Skariatine, see Note in the Appendix.—Skariatine (who had commanded the Selinghinsk Redoubt in February or March, and well knew the ground) was a Lieutenant in the Russian navy, and one of the most gifted of that superb body of men—the men of the Black Sea Fleet—who had gloriously defended Sebastopol in the early, the desperate time.

NOTE 4.—Will attempt a recapture.—When long afterwards he was borne off the field, his bearers trod on one of the 'infernal machines,' and the violent explosion that followed is supposed to have produced by concussion a permanent injury of the heart, bringing death very many years afterwards to the distinguished General Armstrong, then holding high office at the Horse Guards.

NOTE 5.—To retake the counter-approaches.—The Captain led five companies, equal, if the battalions had been at their average strength (which, however, was far from being the case), to about 935 men.

NOTE 6. Had been definitively won. On the morning of the 7th, Captain Dawaon, R. E., was killed; and having been summoned to replace him immediately, Wolseley did not have the benefit of the arrangement which had wisely provided that those who were to attack the Quarries in the evening should be exempt from toil during the day, so as to enter fresh upon their work. Whilst speaking of Captain Wolseley, I may mention that for his services in the fights of 'the Quarries' he won twofold praise,—from Colonel Tylden, commanding the Engineers, and from Colonel Shirley, commanding the combatants.

NOTES TO CHAPTER VI.

NOTE 1.—Nothing that the Emperor ordered.—Pelissier's method of resistance to his Emperor at the time indicated resembled the sustained contumacy of Lord Palmerston, when Foreign Secretary in the Governments of Lord Melbourne and Lord John Russell, as exhibited with great clearness in the Greville Memoirs.

NOTE 2.—‘By orders of the English Government.’—If the Emperor meant (as he apparently did) that the Kertch Expedition was dictated to the commanders by the English Government, he was mistaken. The measure, as I understand, originated with Lyons, and had been warmly supported by Lord Raglan, before the London Government took any part in it.

NOTE 3.—Might be well carried into effect.*—There were many apparent advantages in the plan of an attack from Eupatoria directed against the rear of the enemy's field-army.—

1. Eupatoria was a seaport town, and operations thence proceeding could and would be supported in many ways by the power of the Allied Navies.

2. The town was already held by Omar Pasha with an Ottoman Army which for months had successfully defied the enemy, and might advance in due order from its base, confronting of course the four perils of war, but without plunging into 'adventures.'

3. The attack might be made without drawing any great body of infantry from before Sebastopol, Omar Pasha indeed declaring that he required no aid at all from the infantry arm.

4. What he mainly required was the assistance of cavalry, and that was a species of force which—because not in use for siege purposes—could be easily spared by the Allies confronting Sebastopol.

5. Eupatoria had already been linked to the French and English camps on the Chersonese by the submarine telegraph, and by means of that powerful aid the movements of the field army advancing from the seaport town could be made to take place in close concert with the operations of the besiegers.

6. With the aid of the cavalry that could be easily spared from before Sebastopol, any defeat sustained by Omar Pasha might be made to result in an orderly retreat upon his fortified base; and there was no apparent reason why even misfortune, if visiting this kind of attack, would be likely to result in disaster.

NOTE 4.—Of all the projected assault.*—The 'omission' was this:—

Boquet had retained in his own hands a plan of the Malakoff which had been found in the pocket of a slain Russian officer instead of forwarding it at once to headquarters. Palmer did not content himself with a single remonstrance, but followed it up by another expressed in strong angry language.

NOTE 5.—Confined to only a few score of men.*—For want of separated returns I am prevented from giving the exact numbers, but, although not precise, the statement in the text is well based.

NOTES TO CHAPTER VII.

Note 1.—Searcs exceeding, he thought, 150.—After seeing the statement of losses in text and footnote (p. 195), and making large allowance for the number of those who may have moved off with wounded men, one may understand how it could have become possible that this rough estimate was not far from the truth.

Note 2.—A grape-shot striking his forehead.—Observers at first all imagined that a grape-shot wound in the head which buried down the general, and deluged him with blood, must almost of course be fatal; but it proved to be otherwise, and the veteran before long was again at the side of Lord Raglan.

Note 3.—By a wisely designed cannonade.—This is substantially a negative assertion; but is still, I think, warranted, because M. Rousset, who had access to all papers of the French War Department, and used them with great care and skill, has remained unacquainted with what in the text are called "the 'governing facts.'

Note 4.—Only some 2000 strong.—General Todleben stated that the English led by General Eyre had been defeated; but what mainly seems to have brought him to a conclusion so far from the truth was an erroneous impression with respect to the object of the attack. He wrongly imagined that the object of General Eyre was to seize the Pére-sip batteries, and built on that idea a conclusion that the non-seizure of those batteries implied a defeat of the assaulting force.

Note 5.—These engagements of the 18th of June.—The English Commander-in-chief addressed to Lady Raglan a letter containing these words:—

"Before SEBASTOPOL, June 19, 1855.

"Yesterday we attacked a Russian work called a Rodan, and the French attacked the works right and left of a tower called Malakoff; the object of both attacks being to possess ourselves of the Faubourg of Sebastopol. We had apparently subdued by the superiority of our fire the Russian artillery, and though the attacks could not be considered otherwise than formidable enterprises, yet the confidence of success was general, and I confess that I participated in that confidence.

"It had been determined that the attack should be made at five or half-past five in the morning, and that the interval between

' that time and daylight should be employed to bring as much artillery to bear upon the enemy's works as possible. Late, however, in the evening of the 17th I heard that General Félixier had resolved to commence at three. I did not like the change, but it was too late to protest against it, and the necessary orders were given accordingly. The Redan was to be attacked by three divisions, and I gave Brown the command of them, each division furnishing men for one column of attack. I left home shortly after two o'clock in the morning, and met Brown in the trenches at three. The French were to commence the attack by signal, and I was to order our advance when I should think proper. Unfortunately the French officer commanding the right column mistook a rocket that was fired for the signal, and began before his time. The general officer at the head of the next column, knowing the mistake that had occurred, did not push his troops forward, and the French left column, of course, remained stationary until General Félixier gave the signal agreed upon. When they were all engaged they seemed to make so little way, and to meet with such resistance, that I thought it right to order our advance. They did so at once; but such a heavy fire, particularly of grape, was brought upon them, that few reached the Redan, and nobody got into it. In short, the operation failed, as well as that of the French; and we have to deplore the loss of many valuable officers and men. Other attacks went on at the same time, and loss was there incurred. We have to deplore the death of Major-General Sir John Campbell, an excellent officer, who has never given me one moment's trouble, and was always satisfied whatever I required him to do; of Colonel Yeo, of the 7th Foot, who had devoted himself to his duty during the whole of the winter; and of many others, among whom is Lord Normanton's son, Captain Agar, of the 44th.

' You may imagine my disappointment at this failure—it is a great misfortune.'

Note 6.—Were thrown back into the ditches. 'The number of troops they [the enemy] brought to the assault was 35,000, without counting their distant reserves. The French advanced on the right flank and centre, the English on the left flank. The besiegers, provided with ladders, fascines, and Sapper's tools, advanced rapidly to the attack. Despite the heavy fire of grape and musketry we poured into them, their columns advanced, reached our Ditches, and commenced scaling the parapets.

' But the line of the intrepid defenders of Sebastopol never swerved. They received the daring assailants with the points of their bayonets, and threw them back into the Ditches. The 'enemy's columns then threw themselves on the Gervais Battery,

'entered it, &c.'*

The beginning of the new sentence above quoted shows that the narrator, in making his earlier statements, was not referring at all to the affair near the Gervais Battery; and this being so, I can state without any qualification at all that the above passages distinguished by italics are not only fiction, but fiction unmingled with any grain of truth.

This fabrication is rendered beautifully consistent with itself by deliberately pointing out General Khrouleff as the officer 'to whom the chief honour of the day is due as commanding the whole of the line attacked,' by withholding all mention of the Engineers (including even Todleben!), and by blending the day's losses with those sustained the day before under the fourth bombardment.

Prince Michael Gortchakoff had the misfortune to become—at least formally—responsible for this fabulous statement; but I have always believed him to be a man of honour, and have taken refuge in the faith that he must have been imposed upon. His headquarters, it must be remembered, were not at Sebastopol, but at some miles' distance from the town on the 'Old City Heights'; and this circumstance naturally may have made it the easier to dupe him.

It will be observed that I see grounds for tracing the origin of the fabrication to the panic which seized upon the garrison when our siege-guns reopened, see chap. viii. p. 219.

NOTE TO CHAPTER VIII.

Note 1.—By their sacred costumes. This is or was distinctly the case in Russia. There the sacredness of a priest used to begin when he put on canonicals, and to end when he took them off.

NOTE TO CHAPTER X.

Note 1.—Harmonious concert.—A difference of opinion on one Home question—that of merging the Ordnance Office in the War Department—did not at all affect the spirit in which the Minister and the General co-operated in the business of the war.

* Ann. Reg. 1855, p. 242.

NOTES TO CHAPTER XIII.

Note 1.—Grace and perfect clearness of style.—Of this any one acquainted with Lord Raglan's style may judge, for the despatch was published (Sayer's Collection, p. 219). I may here mention that the contents of this chapter are based upon the above and other despatches and official papers, upon the 'Letters from Headquarters,' vol. II., upon communications from Lord Airey, from Archdeacon Wright, and from Dr Fowle Smith.

Note 2.—Was no worse.—It is stated that that day, the 28th, there issued a General Order in the name of the Commander-in-chief (Letters from Headquarters, vol. II. p. 364), but I observe signs of mistake in the date; and at all events, the act was not one that would require more than simple assent on the part of Lord Raglan.

Note 3.—Appeal to Heaven.—In a sense, others were present—that is, the Chief of the Staff and other members of the Headquarters Staff, and the whole of the personal Staff, and besides, Lord George Paget; but the bedroom being small, these stood, it seems, outside its open door.*

Note 4.—Fresh disappointments and losses.—See Memorandum by our Chief Engineer, dated 'Headquarters before Sebastopol, 29th June 1855,' Journal Royal Engineers, vol. II. pp. 232, 233.

His words were: 'It is not desired to abandon the attack of the Redan if it can be done with a chance of success and without sacrificing the lives of men needlessly. It is therefore desirable to know whether the French will give any aid by directing a heavy and steady fire upon the batteries in the Jardin (of Bas-tion) du Mat and Garden batteries, whilst the English batteries in the Left Attack will assist in that important object, and at the same time bring a heavy fire upon the works on the right of the Redan and Barrack Battery; or in what way the French and English attacks can be combined for the success of the one grand object each have in view.'

Far from involving a return to determined attacks (i.e., attacks culminating, if necessary, in assault) on the town front, this request only pointed to assistance from the French artillery—a matter of course—and one is therefore well justified in treating our Engineer's consent to go on against the Redan as substantially absolute.

It is true that our Chief Engineer some time afterwards, that is, on the 11th of July, tried hard, though in vain, to resume some part of the position he had taken up on the 21st of June; * but that circumstance makes it so much the clearer that the surrender of the 29th was caused by feelings resulting from the death of Lord Raglan in the evening of the previous day.

* Letters from Headquarters, vol. II. p. 362. Private MSS.

NOTE 5.—On board the Caradoc.—Still commanded by Derriman. Lyons was not present. The latter part of the mournful ceremony would for him have been hard to bear, for he was devotedly attached to Lord Raglan; but also he at this time had recently lost his son.

* Roussel, vol. ii. p. 304.

INDEX TO THE WHOLE WORK.

---

Ahd Pasha, the Ruler of Egypt, at Vienna Conference, viii. 812.
Ahdif Efendi at Vienna Conference, viii. 819.
Ahmed, the, ix. 177, 180 et seq.
Abdjal, Major, v. 274.
Abdul Mjid, I. 11.
Abercornus, 18. 273 note.
Abercromby, Sir Ralph, fl. 281.
Aberdeen, Lord, i. 18 note, 36—his conference with Nicholas I. in 1844, 70—Prime Minister in 1853, 87—loving peace, yet responsible for a policy leading towards war, 185, 202, 348 et seq.—his evidence before the Sebastopol Committee, 365 note—relations of his Government with Louis Napoleon, 360—his interview with Count Walewski, ii. 7 et seq. his Cabinet, after Sloope, first resolves to do nothing, then yields to the pressure of Louis Napoleon, 25, 30 and note—continuance of his imprudent language, 48, 62, 65, 74, 92, 165, 180 note, 167, 114, 129, 182, 140, 144 et seq. the instructions sent by his Cabinet to Lord Raglan, 247—resignation of his Government, vii. 281—his want of qualification for the Premiership in wartime, 282—his merit in one respect, 68 and 283.
Abrial, Major, ix. 142, 203.
Aston, Lieut., at Inkermann, vi. 141, 300, 370, 430—the combat undertaken by, 431, 433, 442 note.
Adams's brigade at the Alma, iii. 171—placed in line on the famous knoll by Lord Raglan, and forming the 'sovereign arch,' 277-284.
Adams, Colonel, ix. 208.
Adams, General, at the Alma, iii. 85—
at Inkermann, vi. 103, 145, 148, 168, 174, 176, 177, 179—forced back, 180,
194—he is mortally wounded, 18.
Adlerborg, General, ix. 21.
Admiralty, the, vi. 18, 40-42 et seq.
Adrienne, the treaty of, I. 24, 181.
Adrianoche, II. 44, 199.
Adye, Colonel R.A., at the Alma, II.
175, 193—et seq. Inkermann, vi. 299 note, 487.
Agreement, the, regarding the prosecution of the war, drawn up at Buckingham Palace, viii. 251.
Alnaly, Colonel, 98d Highlanders, at the battle of Balaklava, v. 75 et seq.
Airey, General, Quartermaster-General, II. 334—his quick perception of the great need, i.e., means of transport, 354—his seizure of a convoy, 366, 378, 380; iii. 83—at the battle of the Alma, 175, 171, 300, 324; iv. 136 et seq., 17 note, 178 note—his letter to the Commander-in-chief at the Horse Guards on the result of the Conference taking place between the flank march and the siege, 210—at the battle of Balaklava, v. 47, 58—he conveys message to Cathcart, 183—he writes the 'fourth order' addressed to Lord Lucas, 189, 191, 197, 198, 310, 395 note, 391, vi. 178, 221, 232, vii. 294—his early and copious requisitions for things needed, 467 note—made by error the subject of an outcry in England, but praised by Lord Raglan, 276—the proposal to give him the command of a division, 176—Lord Raglan objects to the removal of his right-hand man, 279, 466 note—his address before the Chelsea Board of Inquiry, 329, 324, 467 note—conference of three, viii. 24 his mission to Canrobert, 29—his affection for Lord Raglan, ix. 226 at the bedside of his dying chief, 281.
Albanian Christians, attack on Colonel Kelly by, when lying wounded, viii. 96.
Albemarle, Lord, quoted, vii. 479 note.
Albuera, Men, remember! Captain Stanley's words to the 17th at Inkermann men, and meaning of the alliance, vi. 368; ix. 176 and note.

Alexander II., Emperor, the mandates of, viii. 319.

Alexander, Fort, iv. 48 et seq.—its defences, &c., &c. seq.—the French attack on, and its result, 307 et seq.

Allied Countess, viii. 216 note.

Alger, Sergeant, vi. 224.

Ali Pasha, ii. 213.

Allied armies, the commandants of the French and English armies, ii. 144—Marshal St Arnaud, &c.—Lord Raglan, 264—Marshal St Arnaud and Lord Raglan brought together at the Tchernia, 174—and later, on the shores of the Danube, 264—severe censure of the two by St Arnaud, and reprimand by Lord Raglan, with the aid of Lord Stratford, &c. seq.

Allied forces, the, which sooner or later were present on Mount Inkermann the day of the battle, vi. 604.

Allied infantry, approximate compilation of, on Mount Inkermann, which was still in an organised state at the opening of the third period, vi. 618.

Allied troops before Sebastopol, number of, viii. 360.

Allies, strength of the, ii. 189—tum to operate as a 'movable column,' &c.—the nature of their advance to Sebastopol, &c., &c. seq.—march of the, iii. 7—their last halt before the battle of the Alma, 31—critical position of the Allies at Belbek, iv. 1—strength of the, at the opening of Pelissier's command, in May 1855, ix. 7.

Allix, Captain, vi. 99 note.

Allowances, extra, of food and drink to the French soldier, vii. 431.

Alma, the, ii. 312, 323, 324, 325—the Allies had passed on the 29th the position on the, iii. 1 et seq., & note, i. 19, ii. 20, 31 et seq., 346 et seq.

ALMA CAMPAIGN, THE: battles which resulted in England a cue for the invasion of the Crimea, ii. 302—stage of the war, &c., the battle of Alma on 20th September in the military operations of August. This the origin of the name.<sup>1</sup>—Lord Raglan's decision of the campaign, viii. 224, 225—importance to France of the Alma's victory, 225—its effects on the French army the engaged grounds for war, 225—feelings of the French people, 225—course taken by the French Emperor, &c.—factions of the English for an offensive war, 222—Sebastopol, 224—the longing of the English to attack it, &c.—sense of fearing and dreading the opinion of the nation, 226—illusions of the press, 226—desire for the destruction of Sebastopol, 221—the O. government public, 225 no good stand made in Parliament against the invasion, 226—preparation of the instructions addressed to Lord Raglan, &c.—the news of Sebastopol, 216 et seq.—instructions sent to the French commander, 224.

The Allies at Varna, 261—the state of preparation in the middle of July, &c.—their command of the sea, 262—information obtained by the Foreign Office as to the defences of the Crimea, 264—no information obtained in the Levant, &c.—Lord Raglan confesses that he is without trustworthy information, 264—the instructions for the invasion of the Crimea reach the Allied camp, 265—the men who had to determine the effect to be given to the instructions, St Arnaud (having secured Pelissier under his orders), Lord Raglan, and Admiral Dundas, 266, 268—text of the instructions to Lord Raglan, 266—their extreme stringency, the arrangements leading to justify this arrangement, &c., the want of a strong practically vested in Lord Raglan, 266—his conference with Sir George Brown, 278—his decision governs the actions of the A. & E., 277—he announces it to the Home Government, &c.—the Duke of Newcastle's reply, 279.

Confidence at the French Headquarters, 280—recognition of the coast, 281—Sir Edmund Lyons, 282—unusual change in the plans of the Gov., 282—council of war, 282—the French urge the abandonment of the expedition, &c.—Lord Raglan's way of handing the French to the plans of the English Government, 287—preparations, &c.—inofficial estimates of the A. & E. to deceive the enemy, 289—fire at Varna, 291—silence, &c.—weakly condition of the R. of an adversary, 294 arrangements to be made for the starting of the second arm, 295—the circumstances, &c.—failure of the French calculations in regard to their own power 296—contumacy and impatience of St Arnaud, 291—he sails without the English, and without his steam-vessels, 293—the small force of the A. & E., &c.—only devolving on the English fleet, &c.—arrangements in regard to the English convoy, 295—troops and supplies left at Varna, 294—departure of the English Armada and of the French steam-vessels, 296—St Arnaud at sea without the English, 297—he sails back, 298—Lord Raglan at sea without the English, 297—his return, 298—Lord Raglan

the report, 100--the pool effect, 100 the whole Allied Armada together at sea, 100--the facts again perited, 100 steps taken by French officers to stop the expedition, 100 on board the Ville de Paris, 100 Arnaud disabled by 100
signed paper read to the conference, 100
St Arnaud leaves all to Lorry Rapetti, 100 conference adjourned to the morning, 100 and Rapetti's day of talking with the French representatives took his own committee apart at the English hotel of the town of Toulon, 100 and had an interview with the chief of the naval staff, 100--the whole Armada to open upon the coast of Spain, 100--the United States necessary, 100 the great value of steel ships during a American War, 100--the loss of ships and the damage done to them, 100--the losses of an armada, 100

The general course of operations, 20—
On the whole & ready to go home to quench the deepest longing place, 207
—the landing-place, 228—step taken by the French in the night, 229—destroys the plan of landing, 230—Sir R. Lyons's way of dealing with the emergency, 231—new landing-place found for the English at Kam-tchatka, 231—position of the English fleet in adapted to the change, 232—position of the invaders in address, 233—of the main English fleet, 233—plan of the landing, 233—General deputations to the fleet, 234—between the English and French and their agents, 234—between the two armies of the landing, 237—its completion, 248—by the English, French, and Tartar, 24—depredations from the Tartar villages to the English headquarters, 252—result of exploring expeditions, 261—freedom of the English army from crime, 261—kindly intercourse between our soldiers and the villagers, 26—the duty of our people in the country by our plan was to have a number of ships over, 264—the forces now on shore, 264.

feature of the next intended operations, 363—comparison between the old system and the system of the 'movable column,' 369—the Allies to operate as a movable column, 366—perilous character of the march from Old Fort, 347—the fate of the Allied armies dependent upon the firmness of the left, 368—the French take the right, 369—Quiz-trustfulness and good humor.

976—the advance began, the order of battle, 977—there was a loss of horses and failing strength of many of the soldiers, 978—the stream of the Duganak, 979—the affair of the, 977—apparently dangerous position of the English army, 980—Lord Raglan causes it to bivouac in order of battle, 981—position on the Alma, 982—Mentzschkeff's plan for availing himself of the position, 983—he forces, 10 ~~984—~~ originally posted in the part of the ~~985—~~
in the part of the position assailed by the English, 10—forces of the Allies, 10—the tasks taken by the French and the English respectively, 11—conference between St Armand and Lord Raglan, 12—the French plan, 13—the part taken by Lord Raglan in the execution of the French plan for the operations of the English army, 14—St Armand's designation, 15—result of the conference, 16—the march of the Allies, 17—causes delaying the march of the English army, 18—the last half of the Allies before the battle, 19—meeting between St Armand and Lord Raglan, 20

~~THE BATTLE.~~ Bosquet's advance, 33—he divides his force, 34—dispersion of the main body of the French army, 35—of the English army, 36—the leading divisions of the English army deploy into line, 36—the Light Division not on its right ground, 36—the march continued, 39—spectacle presented to the Russians by the advance of the Allies, 41—position which the Russian soldiers had been taught to entertain of the English army, 42
~~success~~ at the west of the English army, 43—fire from the ship-guns, 44—movement of Russian troops without orders, 45—canonade directed against the English line, 44—men of leading division ordered to lie down, 45—battle-hail against Lord Raglan and his staff, 46—the Allies could now measure their front with that of the enemy, 51—the village of Bourlonv set on fire by the enemy, 54—effect of this measure on the English line of battle, 54—General Bosquet's operations, 55—after a momentary check, he establishes himself on a cliff, 59—measures taken by the Russians, 59—the effect of Bosquet's turning movement upon Mentschikoff, 61—his measures for dealing with it, 61—canonade between Mentschikoff's artillery and that of Bosquet, 64—Bosquet's position, 66—the order into which the Allies fall, 67—artillery contact, 68.

Chesnabre's advance across the river, 88—his difficulty with his artillery, 79—80 Armand pushes forward his reserves, 74—opportunity offered to Menschikoff, 76—the battle languishing, 77—causes which occasioned the failure of the French operations, 79

A desponding account of Bouvet's condition is brought to Lord Raglan, 80—he resolves to precipitate the advance of the English army, 81—order for the advance of the English Infantry, 81—Evans detaches Adams with two battalions, and advances to the bridge, 85—the conflict in which he became engaged, 86—advance of the Light Division, 86—the task before it, 86—means for preparing a well-ordered assault open to the assailants, 87—the Division not covered by skirmishers, 88—Sir G. Brown's order for the advance, 88—the left bank covered with the enemy's skirmishers, 89—nature of the duty attaching upon General Butler, 89—the 12th Regiment, 103—state of the five battalions on the left bank of the river 89—Sir George Brown, 89—General Codrington, 103—his resolve to storm the Great Redoubt, 106—Lacy Yeo and his forces ~~in~~ <sup>on</sup> the banks of the river, 108—the Russian column is defeated and retreats, 116—the storming and seizure of the Great Redoubt, 110—no supports yet coming up from the river's bank, 117—the Guards, 118—the Duke of Cambridge, 119—halt of the 1st Division, 134—General Alvey comes up, 135—his exposition of the order to advance, 136—advance of the Guards to the left bank of the river, 136—advance of the Highland Brigade, 136—some of them ~~in~~ <sup>on</sup> the opposite side of the river, 137—the three batteries against them, 146—our soldiers falling back from the redoubt, 148—losses of the regiments which stormed it, 157.

Cloud which paralyzed the Russians in the heat of the combat, 160—appearance of horsemen on the top of a knoll, 161—order of the Russian general, 161—on the news of the approach, 166—Lord Raglan's advance in person, followed by himself, but without troops, 166—his passage of the river, and advance to the top of the knoll, 168 at seg.—on his way, without stopping, he ordered up Adams's brigade, 171—his position on the knoll, 166—two guns ordered to be brought up, 174—cause of the depression which had open upon the French, 175—the surprise which befell Prince Napoleon, 189—the head of Chateaubriant's division ~~had been~~ <sup>had</sup> the two guns brought to the top of the knoll, 190—their fire causes the enemy to withdraw his guns, 190—and drives him ~~from~~ <sup>away</sup> from the field, 190—progress hitherto made by Evans 190—his advance, 190—it joined by Sir Richard England & the strength of our field battery, 191—Evans's situation, 194—protracted fight between the 7th Fusiliers and the Kaza column, 194—defeat of the column, 210.

State of the field in this part of the Russian position, 213—the advance of the Guards up the slope, 214 of seg.—advance of the Highland Brigade, 226—Sir Colin Campbell's determination, 226—the nature of the fight about to take place on Koengard Hill, 226—Prince Gorchakov's advance, 226—Colonel Hood's manœuvres, 226—his effect, 240—encounter between the Guards and the Russians, 241—the stress which a line puts upon the soldiery of a column, 241—effect of the English army upon Rostovskii, 243—a defeat, 243—and retreat, 244—the loss of Cambridge master of the Great Redoubt, 244—Sir Colin Campbell's conception of his part, 254—the conflict of the Highland Brigade with several Russian columns, 254—defeat of four Russian columns, 255—losses sustained by the enemy on Koengard Hill, 274—return of the last Russian battalion, 275—final operations of the artillery, 286—their losses, 279—Lord Raglan's advance across the Main Causeway, 286—moving at great distance from him of Menschikoff and Gorchakov, 286—the English army on the ground they had won, 286—restricted operations in pursuit of field batteries assisted by English gunners, 287, 288.

Flight of a French artillery train along the plateau, 287—its fire on the great Russian column, 288—Kirkland, exposing the fire to cross fire on the slope, drives the great column inland, i.e., towards the east end—covering fire of the French artillery, 289—Kirkland exposing still his own movement and noting that the French however, when all the horses before him were driven to the northward in reason of his manœuvres, had run out of seg. his works ~~over~~ <sup>over</sup> to the sea, 291—his retreat is not molested by the French, 291.

Great evading of French troops to were the Telegraph, 216—Arras—last survivor at the Fosseux, 242—St. Armand and the practice of the French, 242—The opportunity of cutting off some of the retreating enemy, 260—Lord Raglan's vain endeavour to check the retreat in advance of French troops, 261—a collision of Ferry with Lourmel's brigade, 261—the array of the French on the plateau, 262—the position is safe and for covering the retreat taken up by Lourmel & Co. he now advanced some cavalry, 263—question as to the way in which the retreat should be pressed, 264—Lord Raglan's opinion, 264—his difficulties with the French, 265—the issue of the battle, 266—the chase which great Lord Raglan, 267—the allied troops driven on the ground they have won, 268—Colombey: Turenne's blow comes up, 268—continuation of the Russian retreat, 269—its degeneration into a disorderly flight, 270—losses of the French, 272—of the English, 273—of the Russians, 273.

and the effect on the position of the Allies have been avoided? 274—the actual losses taken, 274—summary of the battle, 275—how far the Allies were entitled to take glory to themselves, 276—some of any shortcomings on the part of the French army, 276—effect of the battle upon the prospects of the campaign, 276.

The long halt on the 1st & 2nd, advance on the Maubeuge and the Bapaume, and the flank march, which brought the Allies to the south bank of the Orneau, 281—shape, II., III., IV., and V., and IV., chap. I.

Almatroff, II. 1, 4, 7, 10, 14 of sq.—Cossack chasseurs at, 287.

Ambroise, the French Emperor's project for advancing troops at, VIII. 264, 267, 268, 274; IX. 20, 22, 264, 266, 267.

* Ambulances Corps, VII. 128.

Annanckie, II. 242.

Annanckie, II. 242—attack on, recommended, II. 20—attack of proupper-le-Grand by Louis Napoleon, 20—chamber's determined resistance to the prohibition of an attack on, 20—fall of, 24, 25, 254.

Anderson, Captain, II. 22.

Anderson, Lieut. Hastings, Jr. 220.

Anderson, Lieut., 26th, II. 190.

Anderson, Miss, VII. 400 note.

Anglo-Français Legion at Jemappes, 2, 141, 144, 146.

Anglesea, Lord, V. 290.

Anglesea fleet, guns of the, III. 297, 298.

Antonoff, II. 16 note of sq., 224 note.

Antonoff, General, III. 226 note.

Antesley, Captain, III. 220 and note.

Antrether, at the Alma, III. 162, 174 note, 187.

Appletonwhite, II. 167.

Appleyard, II. 310.

April bombardment, the, VIII. 120 of sq.—See Siege of Sebastopol.

Aqueduct, the, VI. 408.

Arabat Islands, defence of the, VIII. 207.

Arabot Spit, II. 74.

Archet, the port of, II. 92.

Arab Tobia, the, II. 294 of sq.—Arabs—retreat, v. 27, 28, 29 of sq., 29, 148-150, 150 of sq., 202-203, 204, 205.

Arabs, the mounted, men on the field at battle of the Alma, II. 174.

Archie, Isaac, VI. 242, 272, 273 of sq.

Aricot, General, II. 41.

Argonne, Marne measured at, VIII. 202.

Argentina, Sir George, IV. 276 note.

Armenia, the, converges on the coast of the Orneau, II. 20, 21 and gathers towards the eastern end of same, 277—its exit from Sebastopol IV. 41.

Armenia, companion of the South, II. 40.

Armenia, shading, I. 6.

Armenia in the East, the way in which Eng. and French ministered to their, VII. 24.

Armstrong, Captain James, Brigadier—Major to Adams at Inkermann, v. 275 of sq.—his communication with the Duke of Cambridge, vi. 178, 179, 180—his stern and successful appeal to a French to take part in, v. 275 his bold and successful attack with the few men he could gather in the crisis of the battle, 284—his leadership at 'the Quarries' of one of the two storming-parties which carried the work in 14 of sq.—desperately wounded, yet refusing to be moved from the 2d and still giving fire commands, 217, 218.

Armenia, general note on, II. 271.

Armstrong, Lord Arthur, at Inkermann, and there killed, vi. 24 note.

Armstrong, Lord, I. 21 of the Army, severely wounded, II. 98.

Armstrong, Major James in 214 of sq.

Army Medical Service, the, VII. 20, 21, 22.

* Army of Discussion, the, VIII. 200—Borodino's, 200 regarding, 216, 217—British Government's opinion of, 201.

* Army of Operations, the first, VIII. 210—Emperor's plan regarding, II. 276, 278.

* Army of Operations, the second, VIII. 266—Emperor's plan regarding, 264.

Army of Paris and their military worth, I. 294.

'Army of Reserve' (Prestwich), orders to bring up, from Constantinople, vii. 200—how affected when hearing of the recall of Kertch expedition, 277.

Artalage, Captain, R.N., of the Highflyer, ii. 233 note.

Arnold, H. 210 et seq.

Artakoff Battery, the, ii. 174, 177 (map), 182.

Artillerist Battery, the, Kamtschatka Lopatine assailed by, v. 20 and note, &c., 202 note.

Artillery Day, iv. 187, 188.

Artillery Fort, &c. 47 (map).

Ardie, Sergeant, vi. 248.

Ahution, Sergeant, v. 377.

Antapof, attack under, at Wermant Ridge, viii. 90—steps taken to repel the enemy th.—defeat of column, 100.

Artay, iii. 212.

Artillery, French, vi. 270, 274.

Attack, the Left, iv. 441.

Attacks of the 17th and 18th June, see in vol. II. the contents table for chaps. VI. and VII.—the true merit of the Russian defence, 200—Prince Gortchakov's fabulous announcements, 210—Palmer's explanations, 211—the real cause of his failure, 21—Tolleboff's counter-attack, 23—costs of General Byre's victory in proportion to the advantages gained, 215.

Awbery, J. 208.

Aurep, General, H. 21.

Austria. See contents of vol. I. and vol. VIII, chap. XII.

Austria and Prussia, union of, with Western Powers, viii. 307—anomalous character of union, 206—its benefits, 209—its costs, 210—partition of Prussia, 311—loyalty of Austria, 311.

Austerlitz, General d', at the Alma, II. 36—advance of, under Bouquet, 37—guns brought against him, 39-44, 41; vi. 11, 40, 281—his brigade, 31—opposes Kreuleff's night attack, viii. 89—incorruption of troops under Kertch, 202, x. 40, 44, 49, 51, 54—the imperfect discipline of his troops in the Kertchine peninsula, 56—his forces, 152, 155—the movements of his troops at the 18th of June, 36—his attack, 141—his prospects, 142-144—messages from, 200—continued operations of his troops, 46—his desire for reinforcements, 201—the conflict undertaken by his troops, 203—he is without support and withdrawn, 205, 211, 213, 214.

Ayon Pass, the, movement of troops projected by the French Emperor, viii. 246.

Arm battalions, regiments of, at Balaclava, viii. 27.

Arndt, the son of, II. 206, 210; ix. 48, 49, 51—the Allied admirals in the 61—nature of the operations undertaken in the, 61-67—the loss of, 76, 84, 86, 204, 206.

Baidar, the valley of, iv. 202, 203; v. 27, 45 et seq., 51 et seq.—proposed placing of French troops at, viii. 204; ix. 26.

Bailie, iv. 294.

Bakst Sheld, II. 206; III. 210, 248, 250, 262, iv. 5 et seq., 17, 19, 70, 30 et seq., 34, 144, 164, 181, 187, 191, 200; vi. 62—proposed movement on, viii. 201; ix. 26.

Balaclava, see Balaclava, &c. 1—the task of selecting generals of cavalry for a campaign to Lord Raglan's—Lord Cardigan's 1—General Troxim, 26—the isolated position of the forces defending Balaclava, 26—strength and boldness of the Russians in the valley of the Tchernaya, 26.—the Balaclava position, 27—the armament of the works, 28—the Kamara Height left in possession of the enemy, 28.—Sir Colin Campbell's confidence in the maintenance of the position, 28

Balaclava—(the) purpose of securing the defences, 48—the object of the contemplated attack, 49—tidings of the impending attack, 49—advances of Lord Raglan and his staff in the direction of Canrobert's Hill, 49—orders from Lord Raglan for the immediate advance of the cavalry, 49—vigilance evinced by the Turks, 49.—the English soldiers' want of vigilance, 49.—the army's advance ordered by Lord Raglan and Sir Colin Campbell, 49—intelligence sent off by Lord Raglan, 49—Lord Raglan's demonstration with his cavalry, 49—advances of General Gribeu from the direction of Balaclava, 54—he takes Balaclava and establishes a battery, 54—forward movement of the Russian forces, 54—Lord Raglan's decision, 57—Russian batteries established against Canrobert's Hill, 58—the fort on Canrobert's Hill silenced, 58—continued resistance of the Turks, 58—the work stormed, 58—overwhelming strength of the Russians in point of numbers, 60—abandonment by the Turks of the three next redoubts, 61—occupation of the three redoubts by the enemy, 62—observations on the first period of the battle, 62—Lord Raglan's post of observation, 67—Canrobert's dispositions, 71—Lord Raglan's new dispositions &c. &c., 71—the concentration of the Russian forces, 71—Isolation of Balaclava, 73—the Russian forces secure for the time against the attack of Balaclava, 74—the forces now threatening Balaclava, 75—the forces that could be opposed to them, 76.—Lured a general trying a venture with his cavalry, 76—the design with which this was resorted to, 76.—advance of the Russian cavalry, 76.—arrangements for defending the advance to Kadikli, 77—advance of Russian horse, 78—flight of the Turks, 79—position of the (Sir Charles) Courtney after the flight of the Turks, 80—continued advance of the Russian squadrons, 80—altered movement of the assaulting squadrons, 81—Courtney's counter-maneuvre, 81—its effect, 81—now far encountered by the Turks in their flight, 82—want of arrangements for an effective look-out, 83—advance of the main body of the Russian cavalry, 83.—march of the Heavy Dragoons under Scarlett, 87—cause which induced Scarlett to dispense with precautions, 88—sudden appearance of the enemy's cavalry on the flank of Scarlett's dragoons, 89—his resolve, 89—his dilemma, 90—his decision, 90—the part taken by Lord Lucan after hearing of the Russian advance, 90.—meeting of Lucan and Scarlett, 90—Lord Lucan's part in the attack, 90—position of the left squadron anterior to Scarlett's charge, 90.—the number of the Russian cavalry confronting Scarlett, 91—well-executed maneuvre of the Russian cavalry, 93—the Russians slacken pace, 93—deployment effected by the Russians on each flank of their column, 103—Scarlett's task, 103—the military spectators of the combat, 104—directive colours of the uniform worn by the Russians and the English dragoons, 98.—the group of four horsemen now collected in front of the Greys, 106—Scarlett's deviation from the accustomed practice, 108—his advance 108—his distance from his squadron, 98.—in the column, 112—the ancient friendship between the Scots Greys and the Inniskilling Dragoons, 113—unavoidable slowness of the advance in its earlier moments, 115—progress of the advance, 116—Russo-horsemen reporting to Scarlett, 98.—the officers who charged with the Greys, 117—98, with the Inniskillings, 18

The charge of the three hundred, 114—the manœuvres of the two Russian wings, 140—Lord Lucan's orders and directions, 142—the order of operations of our supports, 143—see 4th Dragoon Guards, 166—the Royal, 167—the 5th Dragoon Guards, 160—change in the bearing of the combatants, 168—efforts made to get the German brigades to the front of the impasse, 169—the charge of General Gheorghe Bibescu of the 1st Dragoon Guards, 170—the charge of the cavalry on the front of the British battle-line, 171—plan of sending troops to reinforce those on the frontier, 172—position of the enemy by our dragoons, 173—charge of the 4th Hussars, 174 between the Russian cavalry and Scarlett's brigade, 175—the admiration exerted by the exploit of Scarlett's brigade, 176—congratulation addressed to General Scarlett by Lord Raglan, 177—complaints on the right, 178—the time occupied by the fight, 179.

The Light Brigade at the time of Scarlett's engagement, 164—Increase of the number of Lord Cardigan's men which permitted the Light Brigade at the time of Scarlett's engagement, 169—Lord Lucan's message of reproof to Lord
Cardigan, 172

Lord Raglan's perception of the new phase into which the battle had passed, 190—change wrought in the position of the Russians by the defeat of their cavalry, 181—Lord Raglan's purpose, 182—circumstances under which Lord Raglan determined to appeal to his cavalry, 185—the third order th.—Lord Lucan's construction of it, 186—his second and final order of the Headquarters Staff, 186—the fourth order, 189—Captain Nolan, 190
the 21st—on the morning of May 20th he received Lord Lucan, 191—intention of Liprandi at this period of the action, 194—Lord Raglan's perfect apprehension of the state of the battle, 195—his opinion on the cavalry's position available for attack, 196—position of our cavalry at this time, 197—arrival of Nolan with the 'fourth order,' 198—text of the 'fourth order, 199—Lord Lucan's reception of the order, 200—the altercation between Lord Lucan and Nolan, 201—Lord Lucan's determination, 202—his order to Cardigan, 203—dispositions for the advance of the cavalry down the North Valley, 213—Lord Cardigan and his staff, 214—his impression as to the nature of the task imposed upon him, 217

Advance of Lord Cartigan and the Light Brigade, 217—appearance of Captain Nolan in front of the brigades, 218—his probable object, 219—Nolan's fate, 220—questions as to the degree in which he was justly attached to Nolan.

261—movement on the part of the enemy which shows the exact adaptation of Lord Raglan's written orders to the exigency of the hour, 262—awakening of the Russians to the opportunity which our Light Brigade

263—upon the advancing brigades from both flanks, 264—officers acting with the two regiments of the first line, 265—continued advance of the brigades, 266—the pace, &c.—Lord Cardigan's right way of leading the brigade, 267—increasing difficulty of restraining the pace in the first line, 268—state of the first line, &c.—casualties in Lord Cardigan's personal staff, &c.—continued advance of Lord Cardigan and his first line, 269.—the advance of the three regiments acting in support, 270—officers present with the regiments, &c.—the order in which the supports advanced, 271—the near approach of our first line to the battery, 272—Lord Cardigan's charge into the battery at the head of his first line, 273—part of the first line led by Captain Morris, which outflanked the battery, and was immediately confronted by Russian cavalry, 274—Morris's charge, 275—Morris wounded and taken prisoner, 276—other incidents in this part of the field, 277—continued advance by Lord Cardigan in person, 278—his isolation, 279—his advance towards a large body of Russian cavalry, &c.—endeavour to take him prisoner, 280—the movement in retreat, by which he disengaged himself from his Cossack assailants, 281—the devotion with which Lord Cardigan had led his brigade, 282—his arrival at the battery, 283—his prediction, &c.—his retreat, 284—the lancers who had charged under Morris, 285—the groups of combatants constituting the various parts of the two lines, 286—Mayow's assumption of command then, 287—his charge, 288—his advance in pursuit, &c.—operations of the forces actively supporting the first line, 289—the feelings with which the French saw our Light cavalry advance down the North Valley &c.—the Chasseurs d'Afrique, 290—General Morris, 291—his determination, 292—D'Allouville's attack, &c.—moderate extent of the losses sustained by D'Allouville in proportion to the service rendered, 293—the brilliancy of the achievement of the Chasseurs d'Afrique, 294—the 11th Hussars, &c.—the 4th Light Dragoons, 295—their entrance into the battery, 296—the combat which followed them,

&c.—further advance of Lord George Paget, &c.—the 1st Hussars, 297—the state of the battle at this period, &c.—the retreat of the Russian cavalry, 298—the need there was of fresh troops in order to clinch the victory, &c.

Lord Lucan, 300—the question now forced upon his attention, 301—his course, &c.—the 4th Hussars and the Royals ordered to fall back, &c.—success of the 1st and 2nd Dragoons and by these supported, the Royal Hussars were sent to the rear to the route of the Heavy Brigade, 302—the brigade beat about accordingly, &c.—General Scarlett took command, &c.—the Light Brigade disappearing in the smoke of the field, &c.—the cause of the full import of Lord Lucan's decision, &c.—the French retreat out of the town when the Eighth Brigade was cut off sight at the foot of the valley, 304.

The Light Brigade, 305—Colonel Harvey and his fifteen lances, &c.—their junction with the 4th Hussars, &c.—Liprandi's battalions on the counter-charge, &c.—the squadrons of Jerome's Lancers soon joined in rear of the 4th Hussars, &c.—General Scarlett, the senior officer, in this emergency, 306—he charges, &c.—defeat and flight of the Russian lancers, 307—Shawell's retreat, &c.—the 11th Hussars and the 4th Light Dragoons, 308—their retreat, the approach of the Russian cavalry in person, &c.—Lord George Paget's return to his regiment, &c.—the effect of the appearance of a body of Russian cavalry drawn up across the line of retreat, 309—measures for meeting the emergency, &c.—position of the interposed force, 310—its formation and apparent success, &c.—the sudden change of front, &c.—the turn and sudden halt of the column, 311—the nature of the collision which then occurred, &c.—the scattered course of the two retreating regiments, 312—Lord George Paget's inquiry as to the fate of the first line, 313—the escape of Sir George Woburn, &c.—the escape of Captain Morris, 314—Sir George and the 11th Hussars, &c.—the conduct of the troops of the 4th Light Dragoons, &c.—return to the area, &c.

The first charge of the Light Brigade after the charge, 315—the killing of the disabled horses, 316—the losses suffered by the brigade, &c.—the supposed fate of Captain Lockwood, 317—the small number of prisoners taken by the Russians, 318—the small amount of loss sustained by our troops after closing with the enemy. Who who brought the first fire out of action?—and who brought out the supports?—331—interview between Lord Raglan and Lord Cardigan, 182—Lord Raglan's opinion of Lord Cardigan's conduct in the charge, 48.—interview between Lord Raglan and Lord Lucan, 48.—General Napier's question respecting the exploit of the Light Brigade, the answer of the general and the "Light Cavalry Charge," 337—Lord Raglan's personal expressed opinion on the charge, 48.—General Douay's criticism on the charge, 338.

Liprandi's march of the Odessa battalions, 330—deliberations of General Cauliflower and Lord Raglan, 340—the determination of the Allies, 342—close of the battle, 343—the kind of importance which attached to the battle of Balaklava, 48.—summary of the battle, 344—the loss of ground sustained by the Allies, 346—the evasions resulting from the battle, 354—generous treatment of the prisoners taken by the enemy, 48.—who was the victor? 48.—the effect of the battle upon the self-confidence of the Russians, 351—Lord Cardigan's action with reference to the charge, 48.—was he right? 48.—his theory as to the duty of a cavalry officer placed in his circumstances, 357—his statements and explanations, 358—his written explanations of the course he took in retiring, 48.—counter-statements, 361—the definite question thus raised, 48.—the heroic character of Cardigan's attack, 356.

Balaklava, the plain of, v. 38; vi. 48.
BALAKLAVA, THE SURRENDER OF, v. 346
—why? 346—Lord Raglan providing against the occurrence of a disaster at Balaklava, vi. 48—the two guns which seemed open to him, 48.—the command to capture Sebastopol, 355—the advantages of abandoning Balaklava, 48.—Lord Raglan's indecisive resolve, 48.—conclusive objection to the plan interposed by the Committee—why?—Lord Raglan's efforts to provide means of defending the town, 48.—sacrifices necessitated by the retention of the place, 48.—estimates of the enemy's apparent force, as opposed to ours, 48.—Lord Raglan's continued exertions for its defense, 349—the enemy's now settled purpose, 48.

Balaklava town, iv. 28—Lord Raglan before, 28—surrender of, 28—desertion of the inhabitants of, 29—confusion of the harbor, 29—the English retain possession of it,, 29, 30, 31—the English drew their supplies from, 327—a separate system of defense for it in the event of a general assault, 30.—Sir George Grey's command at, 233, 243, 407—extreme narrowness of the communication through, vi. 94—construction of the wharves at, 95, 96, 98—the defense of, 140, 142, 144, 238, 239—the town during the hurricane, 142, 145 et seq., 205, 289—the road from, 250, 250, 251, 252, 253—the general hospital at, 144—defenses of, strengthened, viii. 1—withdrawal of Russian troops from before, 40.

Balgona, Lord, vi. 203.

Balkit, ii. 301-302, 304, 306 note, 308, 309, 320.

Balkan range, the, ii. 128, 129, 137, 142, 154

Balkan, the, ii. 44.

Balt, Mr Edward Charles, Jr. MA.

Ballard, Lieutenant, ii. 200 et seq.

Baluchistan, iii. 344

Baluchistan, the, i. 122

Bamberg, the conference of, i. 38.

Banff, the, i. 349—the position of the, ii. 10 et seq.—the forces in, 10

Bancroft, James, at Inkermann, vi. 300
—his hand-to-hand fight for life, 300, 324 et seq.

Baring, iii. 273 note.

Baring (Scots Fusiliers), Fr. 300 note;
v. 377 note.

Barker v. 18.

Barber's gun, v. 160.

Barbary General, vi. 162.

Barbatus Captain, picket, vi. 138.

Barbeck Battery, the, the ruined state, iv. 441, vi. 143, 170.

Barbeck Hospital, the, vii. 189, 190—improved condition of, 344

Barrow, the, loose stones so called at Inkermann, vi. 79, 83, 147, 149, 178, 184 et seq., 187, 207, 208, 209, 211, 218 et seq., 225 et seq., 234 et seq.
—attack on the, repulsed by General Goldie and Hawes, 207—the real dimensions of the fight at the, 207 et seq.—still held, 416—continued defense of the, 416—skirmishing on the left point of the, 48—the fight for the, 48 and 427.

Barret, O' Dillion, J. 264.

Barteneff, Captain, iv. 136.

Bartin, the port of, ii. 18

Batch-Bazuka, Lord Raglan on the, ii. 218.

Baudy, M., Russian General-General, i. 52.

Basot (Hub.), v. 149.

Bastion, Central, the, iv. 317, 318.

Batum, George, vi. 266.

Bathurst, ill. 197.
 Bathurst, Lord, vii. 70.
 Battery "Number Four," iv. 197.
 Battery of the Potow, ix. 1-7, 143; ix.
     143, 153, 213.
 Baudin, Charles, i. 263—shot dead, 264.
 Bayley, Captain, vi. 148 note.
 Baynes, Lieut., viii. 213 note.
 Bazaine, General, viii. 210.
 Baziollette, iii. 148.
 Bazincourt, ill. iv. 10 note.
 Bass, i. 254.
 Beach, Thomas, vi. 190.
 Beaufort, Colonel, v. 27.—In service in Spain, 16.—has appointed as extra aid-de-camp to General Scarlett, 16.
     —French officer expresses admiration of the spirit of Scarlett's brigade to
     him, 161, 176, 204.
 Beaufort, General W. F., record of military services of, v. 412.
 Beaufort, Mr, engineer, vii. 207.
 Beauharnais, General Karl, vi. 473 note.
 Beauvois, General, i. 264.
 Beauvois, i. 1.
 Beauvois, the river, ii. 270, 280, iii. 894,
     895—the mouth of, assailable, 247,
     252, 254—the Allies livouse on the,
     261, 264, 271, 273, 294; iv. 1 at seq., 21, 23 at seq., 31, 70, 71, 72, 92 at seq., —upper do., 104, 120, 140, 157, 186
     note, 208 note, 221, 225, 233, 409 note;
     ix. 254—the upper do., iv. 206.
 Belbec, valley of the, ix. 212.
 Belgrade, ii. 255, 262.
 Bell, vi. 60 note.
 Bell, Captain, iii. 120, 157 note, 213.
 Bell, Lieut.-General Sir John, vii. 473
     note.
 Bellaire, Captain, at Inkermann, vi. 96, 103, 114—the perception of a sudden emergency, 145—the charge he led, 146, 157, 160, 175, 250, 336, 343.
 Benoist, General, vi. 264.
 Benoist d'Argy i. 261.
 Bent, Captain, ii. 210, 218.
 Bent, Major, viii. 190 note.
 Bentinck, General, iii. 125—his report on the battle of the Alma 4-5 to, 223 note; vi. 104—interpretation of,
     104, 206.
 Bentinck, Henry, Major-General, vi. 10.
 Bentinck, Lieut.-General, ix. 151 note.
 Berdiansk, the fort of, operation of,
     ix. 66.
 Berdiansk, the town of, ix. 66.
 Berkeley, Colonel, iii. 215, 471.
 Berkley, General Sir George, vi. 473
     note.
 Bernard's, General, winter operations,
     ix. 196.
 Bessy, i. 264.
 Berlitzoff, surprise of advanced siege-works by, viii. 101—check of the enemy, 102—and subsequent result, 103.

Besica bay, i. 206; ii. 191.
 Besiegers and the garrison, strength of 108, in Oct. 1854, iv. 487.
 Bettia and Peto, vi. 465, 478.
 Beuret, General, ix. 19, 20.
 Beville, Colonel, i. 349, 351.
 Bibikoff, Colonel, vi. 260.
 Bigotte, Lieutenant, vi. 262.
 Bingham, Lord, v. 47.
 Bischoff, iii. 24.
 Bizot, General, iii. 206; iv. 197, 210;
     viii. 24, 76, 86, 101 at seq., 204.
 Black Sea, the, the Russian armboard of,
     i. 363; ii. 35—the use of, by Russian ships constructed, 17, 307—the strength of the, vii. 90, 92, 124—expedients for depressing preponderance of Russia in the, viii. 314—difficulties of Vienna Conference regarding, vi. 41
     seq.
 Black Sea Fleet, the Czar's, ii. 274, 282 —strength of the Russians, iv. 46—the partial destruction by Menschikoff, 1855, iv.—the resolve to dismantle it, v. 204; vi. 204, 214.
 Blax Colored, vi. 216.
 Blake, Colonel, iii. 114, 156 note.
 Blood-frenzy, v. 261.
 Bombardment, First, iv. chap. xiii.—
     Second, or April bombardment, viii.
     chap., vi. 1-14, iii. 21 at seq.—its consequence, 130—Fourth, the, 17th June, 142 at seq.—its renewal on the 18th, 198—its effect, 217—the stress it put on the Russians, 214.
 Boulby at the Alma, iii. 154.
 Bouilly's guns, vi. 235.
 Bouilly's, Lieut., demi-battery, attack on, vi. 3-6—capture of the demi-battery, 320—limited effect of the capture, 46—recapture of the guns by a little body of Zouaves, 321.
 Born, Captain, ix. 209 note.
 Borodino Regiments, the, vi. 113 at seq.
 Borseaux, Animal, ix. 266 note.
 Bosphorus, the, i. 255, 261—the Brit-ish's ancient right to control the,
     and the Straits of the Dardanelles, 66; ii. 7, 46, 150; iii. 164, 196, 198,
     221, 231, 236, 344 & seq., iv. 29, vii. 34,
     86, 88, 467—confusion in the, 26, 28,
     104, 117, 121, 128, 132, 182, 201, 209, 217, 222—proposed opening of the,
     viii. 824.
 Bosphorus, the Clemartine, viii. 202.
 Bouquet, General, ii. 153, 184—at the Alma, chap. i. vol. II.—at Inkermann, overriding the French army of observers, his position and duty,
     vi. 1-12—dissolved for a while by Gordons of the 2nd regt. 43—he meeting with Sir George Brown and Sir George Cathcart, 47—their rejection of his proposal to bring up troops to the support of the English, vi. 48—seen unseated, he first made two battalions to Mount Inkermann, then bringing greater force from those he had in person, 264—his surprise upon entering the field of battle, 266 of seq.—the part that with chequered fortune but at last with the brilliant charge of his Zouaves and Allobrites he was able to take in the battle, 269-270—in the action of the 7th of June, his strong resolve brought to bear with effect, ix. chap. v.—his removal to another command, chap. vi.—his recall to his old command on the 13th, vi., and his opinion accepted by the ch. of 40.

Brown, Sir, v. 208, vi. 20, 22, 48, 74, 75 of seq., 101, 223.

Broad arrow, attack by, at Worcester Ridge, viii. 84—opposed by Captain Medley Vicars, vii.—then by Colonel Kelly and Major Gordon, 91—defeat of Russian column, 91—his attack, ix. 121, 141.

Brouet de Villeneuve, Admiral, iv. 200 note, 221 note, 405.

Bourbaki, General, at Inkermann, vi. 11, 44, 272, 292—meeting between the General and Colonel Bonapart, 222, 261.

Bourbaki's Brigade at Inkermann, vi. 119, 261 note, 282, 283—two battalions, 294, 295, 410.

Bourgas, II. 198.

Bourbouk, on the field of the Alma, II. 8, 6 of seq.—the village of, set on fire, 86, 84 note, 164 note—Lord Raglan after the battle there visits the wounded, 207.

Bourmont, II. 191.

Bourqueny, Baron de, II. 112—at Vienna Conference, viii. 210, 321.

Boussiniers, vi. 159, 360.

Boussinier's guns, vi. 318—in battery on the Fere Ridge, 361—his artillery-batt., 364, 366—the havoc wrought in his batteries, 369—their removal from the Fere Ridge, 400.

Bowden, Lieut., iv. 376.

Boxer, Admiral, vii. 91, 123; ix. 222.

Boyd, v. 117.

Boyd, Corporal, death of, viii. 277.

Brockbridge, Mrs., vii. 369.

Brockbury, Mr (Crimson Army Fund), vii. 348.

Bromston, vi. 291.

Bronson, Colonel de, ix. 100—hindmost, 110.

Bronfing, Captain, III. 223; iv. 26.

Brybrook, III. 164.

Breastplates for French army under orders from Louis Napoleon, viii. 42.

Bretton, General, iv. 342 note.

Bretout, Lt. note, vi. 194.

Bright, the Light, II. 304.

Bright, vi. 68.

Bright, Captain, vi. 68 note.

Bright, Mr, his striking eloquence, and too general reprobation of war, II. 60 of seq., 107, 144 of seq.

Bright, the Web, v. 144.

British forces, strength of the, II. 264.

BRITISH GOVERNMENT, THE, AND LOUIS RASPOL: the Home Government (after Lord Panmure's first return, dissolved and succeeded in v. L vi.) co-operating harmoniously with Lord Raglan, vii. 252, 253.

Brown, II. 158.

Brown, Captain George John, v. 204, 327.

Brown, Private, v. 204.

Brown, Sir George, commanded by the Light Division, II. 226—at Lord Raglan's instance gives his opinion upon the project of invasion, 269 of seq.—his son in making preparations, 264—his gallant, though artless, leadership of the Light Division at the Alma, II. 9, and in chap. I. see, II. 10, 20, 21 and 25—his vehement resistance to plans for drawing closer the investment, iii. 102, iv. 247—at Inkermann, see 'Contests,' table of, vii. vi—on the morning of Inkermann, he (as well as Sir George Cathcart) takes upon himself to decline the aid of troops which Desvaux was bringing to the port of Vodou Pagien, 43 &c.—leads a body of French troops, 221 and note—commands the British troops in both the Kerch expeditions, viii. chap. x., and ix. chap. iv.—his command on the 16th of June, 164—his orders to Lord West, 189.

Browne, Captain Cavendish, at night attack on Worcester Ridge, viii. 140, 141 PM.

Brownrigg, Colonel, vi. 47, 186, 203, 214.

Bruat, Admiral, II. 280, 312, 315; iv. 269 note, 416 note—invited to attend conference with a committee of Ministers of War to 231, 232, 233, 234 commands expedition against Kerch, 261—recalled, 267, 275—his report, 275; vi. 44, 82, 88, 208.

Brunet, General, vi. 186, 187, 188, 189 of seq., 191—his attack and death, 194, 191, 211.

Brunswig, Baron, I. 45 note—his departure from London, 203—remonstrance against the entry of the fleets into the Dardanelles, II. 11, 48, 120.

Buchava, v. 177.

Bucharest, II. 48, 213.

Bucharest, the Treaty of, in 1878, I. 130 note.

Duckingham Palace, Council of War at, viii. 244—agreement of, 293, 294.

Buckley, Lieut., vi. 217, vi. 20, 24, 27.

Bristol, Baron, II. 39, 123.

Dugaud, General, II. 154, 157, 160—his order of battle, II. 378, v. 204.

Dufek Aitash, II. 264.
 Dulgank, the stream of the, II. 215, 222, 250—the after of the, 277, 281 note, 286; III. 22—the English position on the, 24 of seq.;
 Dupe, in, I. 22, II. 24, 100, 120, 221, 224, 226, 229, 235, 237, 244; IV. 20; VII. 24, 26, 28, 462.
 Dunn, Lieutenant James, IV. 262.
 Dullez, General, his brigade at the Alma, II. 84, 78 note, 95 note, 98, 101, 102, 140, 141 of seq.—his arrival at Inkermann with four companies of the 77th, VI. 227—his advance against the enemy's approaching masses, II. 129—his terms order and victorious charge, 130—he is wounded, 130, 141, 144, 176.
 Dulver, III. 229.
 Dunbury, Colonel, his offer made to serve in the great war as a War Department, VI. 72, 426 note—his last memoranda act, 431 note.
 Dunbury, Major, at Inkermann, VI. 26, 48 note, 48 note.
 Dunbury, Sir Henry, VII. 408 note.
 Dunnott, Adjutant, VI. 251.
 Duol, Count, II. 79, 112, 113, 114—president of Vienna Conference, VIII. 119—debates opened by, 223—plane submitted by, 225—resolves of, on reception of proposals, 226 of seq.—character of, 247.
 Duol, Count de, conduct of, VIII. 814.
 Duoy, wrongly placed by the French at the landing, II. 229—correspondence respecting the, placed by the French, 412.
 Durghersh, Lord, II. 207 note; IX. 200.
 Duroyne, bearer of colours at Alma, wounded, III. 230.
 Duroyne, Lieutenant, IV. 20.
 Du grec, Mr. John advancing Engineer officer, II. 46, 217; III. 5 note, 247 note, 269 note, 271 note, 273 note, 286, 290, 291 note, 291 of seq., 292, 293 of seq., 294 note, IV. 103 note, 109, 171, 174, 175 note, 176 note, 195, 196 note of seq., 204 of seq., 230, 242, 244, 246, 251 note, 498, 499 note, 477 note, 601 note; V. 290 note; VI. 5 note, 14 note, 671 note; VII. 15, 192, 204, 274, 424, 426, 428; VIII. 22, 24, 74, 75, 111, 112, 124, 242, 363, 364.
 Durke, Knight Henry, VI. 262.
 Durke, Lieutenant, II. 210 of seq.
 Durmash Captain, at Inkermann, VI. 111, 229, 233, 240, 245, 262, 263 note, 264, 271, 274, 275, 279, 282, 487.
 Durme, General, IV. 58 note, 58 note.
 Burroughs, Captain, V. 20 note.
 'Ehusby-hag,' V. 271.
 Butchered the wounded in battle, charge against the Russian soldiery of, VI. 448 the supposed motives, 449, 451.

Dutler, 2nd Regiment, III. 157.
 Dutler, Captain, Cayton Hills, II. 224, 245—his death, 207.
 Dutler, Lieutenant, VI. 41 note.
 Cabinet, the sleeping, on 20th June 1854, II. 216 of seq., note on, 207.
 Cavalry, II. 1 239 note.
 Calhoun, Major, on the Contingency note,
 " " note.
 Calde, Somerset, Captain, one of Lord Paget's aides-de-camp, V. 70, 100, 241 note, VI. 101.
 Calvert, Mr. II. 224. See Cuttley, Mr.
 Cambridge, Duke of, II. 188; III. 27, 49, 45—at the Alma, chap. I. note, 20 of seq.—at Inkermann, vol. VI chap. 19.
 Cameron, Colonel, III. 267, 362.
 Cameron (Grenadier Guards), IV. 200
 note.
 Cameron (Grenadiers), V. 277 note.
 Camoës, in 104—his division, 112.
 Camouflet, driving of a, VII. 26, 262.
 Camp, English, the, at Balaklava, V. 262.
 Campbell, Sir. 20.
 Campbell, General Codrington's aide-de-camp, II. 151.
 Campbell (2nd Regiment), III. 157.
 Campbell, Captain George, V. 146, 200.
 Campbell, Captain Newport, V. 146, 151.
 Campbell, Colonel Robert, II. 116 of seq., 126, 128.
 Campbell, Mr, railway between Balaklava and camp made by, VIII. 48.
 Campbell, Sir Colin, at the Alma, II.
 chap. 1—appointed to the command of Balaklava, IV. 206—at the battle of Balaklava, vol. V.—his dispositions on the Salaman day, vol. VI.
 Campbell, Sir John, VI. 53; II. 266, 276, 277, 278, 279—his death, 176, 184, 206, 208.
 Candia, I. 26.
 Canning, Sir Stratford (Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe), ambassador at the Posts, I. 118 of seq.
 Cannon, General (William Potts), II. 204 210 211 of seq.
 Cannonade, effect of a windily designed, IX. 212.
 Cannon-ball, ways of a, VII. 161 and note, 207, 208.
 Carron, General, the expectations were had been formed of him in '71—his command of troops prepared for the Corp d'Assaut, I. 264; II. 138, 204, 206, 214, 215, 216, II. 24, 25, 26, 27 of seq., 28—his military studies and services in Africa, '71—the Dormant Committee on his hero, 46.—at the Alma, I., II. 73, 81, 178—his division, 186 of seq., 235 note, 262, 267, 291 of seq., 296, 299, 302, IV. 38, 45, 56, 59—proceeding to the command of the French army, 57—his conduct and speech in favour of a sieges as opposed to a prompt assault, 178 at seq., 194 note, 195, 200, 202 note—divides his army, 226, 233 note, 261, 271, 274, 319, 320, 334, 336, 338, 410, 429, 430, 435 at seq.; v. 41 at seq., 57 note, 70, 77, 147, 340—his forces before Lutzen, vi. 4, 7, 12, 14, 16 note, 16, 27, 28, 31, 33, 106, 171, 202, 234, 310, 313, 322—his presence at the heat of danger, 300, 401—the cavalry he had brought up retreating at the retirement of the time (about 11 A.M.), 412—his interview with the Emperor, 413—his inaction, and definitive abandonment of the offensive, 415, 416—the import of this, 417—when afterwards, at about 1 o'clock, the Russians (still assisted by our troops) were to be seen to be advancing to see any post in pressing their retreat, 420.

His council said resolve on the interview of Intercessor to implore me and wait for reinforcements. 470 of me.

In the time of the Winter Troubles he at last relieved our army from some portion of the toll, viz. £36, 34s.

The Emperor's and the agreement with Lord Raglan regard to the future conduct of the war, 21—his subsequent change, 21, 22—against the French night attack of the 24th of February on the Selingue, 22—his failure to inform his people, imparts to Lord Raglan the supposed success of the attack, 22—submitting themselves to all the counter-approaches in the Karabulmaya, he from time to time gives reasons for his successive abstinences, 22, 24, 25 & seq.—the vast scope and ill tendency of his measures against molesting the enemy, 23—~~he~~—he gives up his plan to march to Kowloon, 25 & seq.—his anxious, and at last successful, endeavour to obtain aid from the Turks, 108, 109—he appeals to his Government for the violation of Perimeter as inconsistent with the Imperial plan, 262—he ignores, and even denies, the success of the April bombardment, 261—the miserable instruction he receives from his Emperor, 224—his state of mind, 26—~~he~~ makes an agreement with Lord Raglan for a specified attack, 227—abandons it three days afterwards, 26—agrees with Lord Raglan to undertake a general assault of Sebastopol, but withdraws from his agreement, 228-229—he consults with Lord Raglan and the Admirals

In dispatching a joint expedition to Korea and commanding from the Hwang-Hai) recalls his forces, naval and military, from off the Kercchine Peninsula, chap. x.—he peremptorily refuses in conference to engage any part of his army in the English trenches, and so breaks to pieces the Emperor's cherished plan, 292— he first vainly endeavours to rid himself of the command by an appeal to Pélinier under the Dormant Commission, 295—then by telegraph sends home his resignation, and by order of the Emperor has it over the countersigned by Pélinier, 297 at seq.—the reasons he assigned for his resignation, 298 at seq.—comments made on him at the time by men in authority, 304 at seq.—the effect of recent despatched in lightening or shifting the weight of blame thrown upon him, 306.

Chateaubriant, 37, 3, and small fort erected at the mouth of the river, 37—Tomb of the Duke of Rohan, 37—Bastille of the Duke of Rohan, 37—
 the Duke of Rohan, 37, 42 at seq., 44, 46, 49 at seq.—the Duke of Rohan, 44, 45
 Chateaubriant Redoubt, 37, 47, 50.
 Canterbury, Archbishop of, 1, 20.
 Caradoc, her commander, Derryman, 11, 317—conference on board her, which (under Lord Raglan's impulsion) determined to effect the invasion, 11, 314 at seq.—reconnaissance on board her, effected by Lord Raglan, 317 at seq.—choice of the landing-ground made from her deck by Lord Raglan, 319—the assurance she seemed to give our assembled fleet when coming in from her survey, 16, 320—the freight she was to receive on board, 16 320—her landing places, 16.

Cardew, ill. 158.
 Cardigan v. Caltherpe, the affair—its
     v. 361 note—the proceedings in, 362
     note, 433
 Cardigan's, Lord, command, II. 872, 877 of seq.; ill. 297—his reconnaissance towards Sebastopol, 358, IV. 5, 17, 18
     —his character and antecedents, V.
     11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 18 et seq., 29, 46, 56,
     64—~~the~~<sup>the</sup> charge of the Heavy Dragoon charge, 187, 170 note—his misconception of Lord Lucan's order, 171 et seq., 173, 180, 183, 194, 197—the charge of the Light Brigade, 300 et seq., 311, 314, 315, 317, 320, 326, 334,
     331, 362, 333, 339, 251 note, 257, 258
     et seq.—his retreat, 365 note, 371, 380, 396, 319—the remnants of his brigade,
     325, 326, 329, 332, 336, 347 et seq., 354, 365, 358, 367, 359, 361, 362—the heroic character of the attack, 364, 367, 400
     et seq.; vi. 30—at Inkermann, last days, 370 and note; vii. 370, 374, 473; ix. 363

Coxwell, Mr. vi. 292, 297, 493.
 Creenage Ravine, the, iv. 230, v. 371,
 377—progress of the fight in the, 366, 367, vi. 4, 9, 27, 34, 50 of seq.—road along the channel of the, 75, 38, 90, 91 of seq., 164 of seq., 313 note, 386, 387, 4, 6, 27, 300, vi. 100, vii. 140
 of seq.
 Creeping Bay, iv. 30 of seq., 98 note.
 Croker, L.—attack on the attack at Worennoff Ridge, viii. 102.
 Carmichael, Captain, vi. 36, 38, 219.
 Carmichael (95th), vi. 368, 347, 268.
 Carnegie, Admiral, iv. 246, 263, 418
 note.
 Carpenter, III. 210.
 Carpenter, Colonel, vi. 114 note, 380.
 Castelbagat, M., i. 197, 199; II. 129, 141
 note.
 Casteron, William, vi. 269.
 Castlereagh, Lord, ii. 273 note.
 Casualties, list of English, on Novik Intervent., vi. 424.
 Cauca, Augustus, vi. 322.
 Cathcart, Sir George, General, commander of the 4th Division, the Duxmant Commission he held, v. 329—his apparent effect on his temper, 306, 307—his Division at the Alma, iii.
 304—posted during the flank march on the Balaclava road to the 2nd Division and some cavalry under orders to keep open free communication with the Katcha, iv. 6—his subsequent march to the south side of Sebastopol followed by a conviction that he had found a weak place in the defences, and could carry the fortress in a summary way, 174, 175, and notes
 —the orders he received from Lord Raglan on the morning of the Balac-lava battle, 'to the strange and heavy that followed, 30 at seq.'—he ultimately marched to the 1st, 76—there he receives an order from Lord Raglan to 'advance immediately and "recapture the redoubts,"' 134—he did so, but having misinterpreted the order to recapture the redoubts, 30 of seq.—required by the Government to give up the 1st, as the Duxmant Commission, and does so becomingly, v. 301, 392—on the morning of Inkermann he (as well as Sir George Grey) takes up his position in the aid of the troops which Bosquet was bringing to the support of Lord Raglan, vi. 41, 44—arriving on the field of battle with his Rifle batteries and having no station where no service was needed, he is answered by 'Everywhere!' and with genious readiness to answer appeals, he distributes, piecemeal, the 1700 men then already or nearly in hand, 224, 226, 277—having afterwards with him the 400 men forming the nucleus of his troops, he receives from Lord Raglan an order to move to the left in support to the Guards, and not to descend from the plateau, 221, 222—he, however, under some wild impulsion, moves down to the right and descends from the plateau, 223—after engaging has been lost by Treves in a strange triumphant and needless (224 of seq.) he soon finds himself under fire from a strong Russian column behind him, and with only 50 men of the 29th, undertakes to attack it, vi. 324—the extra-fancy combat that followed, 325, 326—its result, 326—concerns further measures with Maitland, 323 of seq.—is killed, 322.
 Cathcart's Hill, iv. 175; vi. 37.
 Catherine Battalions, vi. 91 of seq., 321.
 Catherine, Empress, her ambition and plans, i. 36.
 Catherine Landing-Place, iv. 200 of seq.
 Catton large-scale 'o', viii. 67 and note.
 Cattery's, Mr., warning regarding the prospect of having to winter the navy in the Chesmean, iv. 448—Lord
 Raglan's stamp of his statement, 449.
 Caucasus, Army of the, II. 280.
 Chavrov, Major, in the leading over the plain of Balaklava, v. 34 of seq.,
 35—his Maximilian gun goes off,
 34 of seq., 35, 37—40, Ridge, 37, 38, 162, 188, 193 of seq., 318 of seq.—the Russian fire crews, 228, 240, 244, 246,
 257, 261 of seq., 317, 329, 343 of seq.
 Chersones, a great Post-road, intersecting the field of the Alma, ii. 4, 7 Intervent., 18, 36, 40—on 140, 143 withdrawal of the batteries, 304, 306, 376 of seq., 308, 310.
 Chavigne, General, i. 264.
 Cavalry for a campaign, the task of selecting generals of, v. 1.
 Cave, Lieutenant, vi. 190.
 Cavour, Count, intervention of, in the war, viii. 318, 374.
 Cayenne, transportation of Frenchmen to the peninsula of, i. 313.
 Central Finland, the, iv. 65 note, 94,
 104 of seq., 314 of seq., 320, 321
 322 of seq.—partially destroyed, 319—assumed + 1 1/2 hrs to be in front of, 306—its part in the combat of the 9th of May, ix. 14, 26, 34—its batteries brought to ruin, but restored
 by Todleben, 26.
 Chadwick, Lieutenant, v. 320, 324, 325.
 Chaff, i. 308.
 Chamberlayne, General, v. 269.
 Charnier, General + 1/4.
 Champion, Major, at the Alma, II. 110
 note, 120—at Inkermann, v. 373, 380.

SM ; vi. 216 note, 246, 347—mortally wounded, 246, 249.

Champagne wing of the 9th happily placed at first, but subdivided to meet pressing wants, vi. 218.

Changarnier, General, i. 204.

Chapman, Captain, at night attack on Voronovo Ridge, viii. 103.

Chapman's or Left Attack, iv. 203, 307, 420 et seq., vi. 7.

Charge of the Leg's Brigade, led by Larocque, v. 100 et seq.

Charge of the Three Hundred, led by Burnett, v. 114 et seq.

Charlton (Sub.), v. 147.

Charner, Admiral, iv. 200 note.

Charren, Colonel, i. 254.

Chartres, Captain, v. 38, 202.

Chase, Lieutenant, killed, iv. 272.

* Chasseurs d'Abdes, v. 172.

* Chasseurs, Greeks, iv. 108.

Chatham, Lord, vii. 466.

Chelsea Commissioners on the red question, vii. 428.

Chevre report quoted, vii. 428.

Cheven, the Inquiry at, vii. 323—the report of the Board, 323, 329—the part of the report in which the Board harrowed the cause of the avertible sufferings, 330—acquiescence of the State in this decision, 331.

Chesn's 'Rapport au Conseil de Guerre des Armées' referred to, vii. 187, 446.

Chermade, Captain, R.A., at Inkermann, vi. 274, 417 note, 430.

Chernosev, the, ii. 246, 268; iv. 31, 147, 183—the defence of the, 197 et seq.—the strength of the position, 230—English encamp on the, 234, 264, 281, 452—difficulty of wintering the army in the, 446, 450.

Chernosev batteries, the, v. 265.

Chernosev Bay, the, iv. 268, 261 note, 271.

Chernosev plateau, the, iv. 48 et seq.

Chernosev steamer vi. 10.

Chernosev, Cape, ii. 214.

Cherka Spit, ix. 46 et seq.

Chertkov, ix. 181.

Chesler, Colonel, killed, iii. 181, 187.

Chetwode, Captain, iv. 33 note, 18.

Chewton, Lord, at the Alma, killed, iii. 219.

Chodziewicz, Captain, iii. 18 note et seq., 78 note—quoted, 217, 274 note, 294 note, 312; vi. 134.

Cholera, on board the French and Eng. at sea: i. 51 of seq.—arrived at, at Bellat, iv. 4, vii. 140; ix. 258 et seq.

Chopped straw, the forage of the Levant, vii. 266.

Christian subjects of the Sultan, the, vii. 374.

Churches, strife between the Eastern and Western, i. 54.

Cimetière counter-approach, the, ii. 31, 21, 23—its recapture, 267 note.

Cimetière Lodgments, the, attacked, vii. 207—at length destroyed, 208.

Cimetière Ridge, the, ix. 15—measures for securing it taken by the French and the Russians, 17—the counter-approach alongside it, attacked and ultimately conquered by the French, 23.

Cimmerian Bosporus, the, viii. 226; ix. 84, 263.

Circassia II. 264.

Circassia town, the enemy's forced abandonment of the whole of the, ix. 46, 263.

Ciate, ii. 317.

City Heights, old, v. 268.

Clement, Colonel, vi. 202 note.

Clement, Major, iii. 80 note.

Clarendon, Lord, Minister for Foreign Affairs, his instruction to Lord Stratford L. 114 et seq.—recognition as the duty of England to protect the Sultan, 186 et seq.—exposes the difference between the words and acts of the Czar, 187—his remonstrance addressed to St Petersburg, 209—the Danubian occupation, 261, 266—on the harmony of the Powers, 247, 254—his interview with Count Walewski, ii. 7 et seq.—instructs Lord Stratford to send for the fleet, 9—his reply to Baron Denikow, 11—on the French proposals, 26 note—his political despatches, 64—his collective note, 79 et seq., 107, 117—the amanuensis to Russia, 114, 117, 149 et seq.—despatch of, demanding the evacuation of the Principalities, 204—at Council of War, viii. 242, 264.

Clarke, Major, v. 117, 118, 126, 154.

Clarke, Mrs., scandal, vii. 417.

Cler, Colonel, viii. 49, 268.

Cleveland, Comet, v. 229; vi. 202 note.

Clifford, Lieutenant Hugh, at Inkermann, vi. 129—his exploit against a Russian column, 181, 181 et seq., 466.

Clinton, H. 188.

Clown, Corset, v. 222, 242, 267.

Clown, Lieutenant, v. 204.

Clutterbuck, Lieutenant, v. 200, 267.

Glyde, Lord H. 229 note.

Coast batteries at Kertch, ix. 49 et seq.

Costa, Wounded at the Alma, iii. 96.

Coldom, Richard, and his opposition to war, ii. 89 et seq.—his views on the Vienna Note, 109, 146 et seq.

Cocktail, Surgeon, viii. 172, 262.

Cockrell, killed, iii. 279.

Coddington, General, iii. 89, 90, 91 and note, 96, 98, 100—his services, 100 et seq., 108—his brigade at the Alma stormed and carried the Great Redoubt, 116 et seq., 126, 128 and note, 148, 151.

of sq., 105, 206, 271 of sq., 225 note, 211; iv. 28 note—at Inkermann, v. 273 note, vi. 7, 9, 27, 32, 34 and note, 50, 75, 98 of sq., 405 note, 436.
 Coffe, green, the supply of, to the soldiers, vii. 121, 422.
 Col. the, v. 24, 27, 122 note, 242; vi. 9, 11, 13 of sq., 40; vii. 24, 26, 28—Lord Raglan's measures with respect to the road by the, 148—vital efforts made to 'metal' it, 104—vital importance of having a metalled road, 106, 204.
 'Col de Balaklava,' iv. 44, 297 of sq.
 Col.-Faygellier, Captain, i. 234.
 Colborn, Colonel, v. 121 note.
 Coldstream Guards, the, iii. 226 of sq.—loss of the, 274.
 Cole, Colonel, ix. 178.
 Colebrooke, Sir Edward, ii. 224.
 Colles, Commander Copper, ix. 71.
 Colles, Lieutenant, iv. 204.
 Columns, movable, ii. 369 of sq.
 Colville, Captain, iii. 200 note.
 Combat fought by the 57th, under Captain Stanley, vi. 204.
 Combats, personal, vi. 202.
 Commander-in-Chief of the Home Guards, vii. 21.
 Communist Commissioners, their aims and versions used as a ground for reviving the attacks of the previous year, vi. 228—initial inquiry into the truth of their aims and versions, 234—constitution of the Court, 23—its proceedings, 229—the report of the Board, 229—the new cleared and clarified state of the controversy respecting the cause of the 'avanture' sufferings, 229.
 Committee at service, the, vii. 21.
 Commune system, colonization appears to have been the, vi. 224—report, 222—aims and versions on these general affairs and one related, 223.
 Committee, the role of the, for a committee of Inquiry, vi. 222, 223—committee appointed, 22, 230, 232, 233, 234—rejection of the motion to make the committee a 'secret' one, 217—its report, 230, 232.
 Compass, march of Infantry by, vi. 2 of sq.
 Coney, iii. 216; v. 146.
 Conference of 14th April, the, viii. 222.
 Conference of Three, the, viii. 26—Camberwick's agreement to decision of, 27—his condition imposed, 26, 208.
 Connelly, iii. 20, 157.
 Connolly, Captain, vi. 146 note.
 Connolly, Lieut., v. 175—in April bombardment, viii. 174.
 Connolly, Major, v. 101, 156, 207.
 Constantine, Cape, iv. 252.
 Constantine, Port, ii. 213; iii. 226—its good strength 22, 228; iv. 41 of sq., 224—its waters and defences, 226 of sq., 224 of sq., 428, 429, 417, 418.
 Constantine of Russia, the Grand Duke, quoted, ii. 199.
 Constantinople, reception there of news announcing recall of Karská expedition, viii. 275, 280.
 Conway, vi. 166.
 Cook, Captain Edwin, v. 207, 208.
 Cockery, defective, vii. 164—its effect on the health of the men, 20.
 Cooper, Mr Henry, ix. 74 of sq.
 Corbett, Lieutenant, vi. 21 note.
 Corps of Observation, operations against Malakoff entrusted to, viii. 21.
 Corps of Reserve, French Emperor's attachment regarding, viii. 227, 228; ix. 7.
 Cossack Knoll, v. 274; vi. 42.
 Cossack Line, vi. 42.
 Cossacks, the, ix. 20.
 Cossacks as they were in the great war, ix. 209 note.
 'Cossacks of the Don,' the, ix. 20.
 Council, the, 1st of March, viii. 75—of 6th March, 77.
 Counter-approaches, the Russians attempt to take the, ix. 211.
 Countermance, Todleben's aggressive, viii. 16—Todleben's system of, 24, 222.
 'Counterpoise' plan, the, at Paris Conference, viii. 228, 230.
 Counter-works on Mount Inkermann, import of, viii. 73, 75, 76, 77, 104.
 Cospé d'Estat, immediate effect of the, upon the tranquillity of Europe, i. 246.
 Covenanters, descendants of the, or Warriors, v. 124.
 Cowley, Lord, i. 147 note, 182, 204, ii. 24, 26 note, 277 note; viii. 242, 250—interview between French Empress and, 242.
 Craigie, Mr. iv. 200, 201 note.
 Craven, Mrs Davis, and the ladies of the Sisterhood, vii. 464 note.
 Crim Tartary, ii. 223—winter in, vii. 24.
 Crimean Army Fund, the, vii. 213—administered by Tower and Egerton, 22, 244, 245—success of the administration, 249 of sq., 277 note—Lord Raglan's letter to the administration, Tower and Egerton, 252.
 CRIMEAN WAR, Orders of war. See the 'Contents' table of vol. I.
 Crofton, Colonel, ii. 210; vi. 192, 201—his charge with some men of the 10th, 225, 226.
 Crofton's troops, vi. 214.
 Crofton's wing, vi. 226, 228.
 Crown's Nest Battery, the, viii. 120 and note.

Cumberland, First Duke of, referred to by George III, vii. 491 note.

Cunningham, Dr., vii. 496.

Cunningham, Colonel, vi. 236.

Corsair, the war-ship, vii. 81.

Coxe, Captain, ix. 117.

Coxe (19th), iii. 184.

Cout, iii. 275 note.

Czar-worship, ix. 78.

Czar's declaration of war in 1856, i. 17 note.

Czar's infantry, the, in need of encouragement, ix. 219—whence apparently the fabrication of the 18th of June, 46.

Cossa, ambition of the, i. 56.

D'Avrion, Captain, ii. 343 note, 344 note; iii. 245; iv. 158 at seq., 161 at seq., 284, vi. 428 note.

D'Avrion, Colonel, iii. 64; v. 271 note, vi. 170 note, 182 note; vii. 426; viii. 143, 171.

D'Aguilar, Captain, vi. 374, 375, 457.

Dalmatia, General, assumes provisional command of French Engineers, viii. 301.

D'Altonville, General, v. 71, 194 note, 204, 278—his attack, 274, 276, 284, 317—his brilliant achievement, 243—his Chasseurs, 353.

Dalrymple, Colonel, iii. 219.

Dalrymple White, Colonel, v. 116, 217, 234.

Dalton, vi. 198, 210.

Dalzell, Major, vi. 255 at seq.

Damer, Dawson, vi. 194.

Dance on wood, the French soldiers used the, vii. 398 note.

Danneberg, General, his command, i. 44, 109; vi. 20 note, 28, 29, 50, 58, 62, 69, 71—his attempt to overrule Menschikoff's arrangements for the attack of Mount Inkermann, (i., p.) 140, 161, 162 at seq., 187, 213, 222, 223, 267, 268 210, 213, 271, 282, 306, 318 at seq., 420, 427, 428, 435 at seq., 457—his altercation with Prince Menschikoff, his estimable chief, 441, 442 and note, 442, 457, 461, 474 note, 477 at seq., 483—removal of from command of 4th Army Corps, viii. 60.

Danube, the, i. 412 note; ii. 2, 213, 214 at seq., 243, 244, 245, 250; iv. 180—freedom of navigation of, viii. 314.

Danube, Lower, the, the main outlet for the products of Central Europe, i. 23, ii. 21, 40 at seq.—crossed by Count Radowitz, 181, 186, 187, 202, 204, 205, 226 at seq.

Dantzig Principality, the, i. 108—the Czar's scheme for occupying them, 194—orders for the arrest of, 214—Czar's occupation of, viii. 300, 311, 312.

Darby Griffith, Colonel, v. 299.

Dardanelles, the, vii. 54, 181—proposed opening of, viii. 296.

Darien co., the Straits of the, i. 264, 265—policy of Russia in regard to, 263, 266—Lord Stratford on the passage of the, ii. 9 note, 11, 46, 196, 282.

Darvel Pines, the, i. 93.

Davobey, Colonel, his singular charge at Inkermann, vi. 831, 336, 341—his effect upon the issue of the combat, 349, 416 note, 457.

D'Avoualle, Duc, v. 272.

D'Avoualle's brigade thrusts itself forward in front of Prince Napoleon, iii. 184 at seq.—movement of, 206, 208; vi. 28.

Davout, Colonel, v. 78, 77.

Day, Lieutenant, ix. 30.

Death, burial of the, by the French at night, vi. 182, 448.

Deane (sub.), v. 144.

Deaths in the hospitals, vii. 188.

De Camis, Colonel, vi. 261, 274, 283, 285—mortally wounded, 261 at seq., 456.

De Flotte, i. 302.

DeLigne, Mr., and his task as editor, vi. 214 at seq., 222.

De Lourmel's brigade, vi. 62.

Despatcher of England, vii. 186 at seq.—the nation steadfast, 202.

De Nob, Vicomte, v. 169 and note.

Derby, Lord, vii. 272.

Dertean of the Canadæ, ix. 317 note.

De Salis, Major, v. 234, 291, 302.

De Salis, General, viii. 218.

Desart Burton, Captain, v. 156.

De Vere, Mr., at April bombardment, viii. 163 and note, 379.

Dev, vi. 279.

'Diamond' Battery, vi. 422.

Dickens, iii. 90.

Dickens, Captain, vi. 148 note.

Dickens, Collingwood, vi. 76 note, 274 and note—he succeeds Gambier, 274, 277, 279, 280, 461, 471, 482, 446, 447.

Dickson, Colonel (Artillery), iii. 174, 175; vi. 173 note.

Diebitsch, i. 68.

'Die-hards' (57th) at Inkermann, vi. 303 note; ix. 176, 177 and note.

Disappontments, fresh, and losses, note on, ix. 314.

Disraeli, Mr., vi. 458.

Ditch, the, ix. 161 at seq., 178, 210.

Ditches, the, the Allies thrown back into, note on, ix. 314.

Division, 3d, strength of, present at battle of Inkermann under General Pennefather, vi. 404.

Dixie, Mr., vi. 110, 141.

Dobrody, the, vi. 197, 202, 203, 272.

Dockyard ravine, the, iv. 493; vi. 56; ix. 107, 161 at seq., 212.

'Dog-trot,' the French, vii. 162, 457.

Box, the months of the, ix. 68.

BORKEAN COMMUNION, His Grace CATHCART AND THE, v. 260, 261, 262, 263 note; vi. 231.

BORKEAN, Mr., v. 260 note; v. 215, 217, 218, 222, 225, 234, 237, 238, 239 note.

BORKEAN, Mr., vi. 136.

Bowling, Lieut., vi. 234.

Brouys de Lhuys, M., i. 260 note; ii. 113; viii. 319, 323, 327, 334, 342 of seq.—interview between French Emperor and, 343 of seq.—resignation of, 344, 351.

BRUNSWICK (Adm.), Sir John, vi. 136.

Bruswell, Captain, iii. 200; iv. 143 and note, vii. 141.

Bruswell, Mr Henry, vii. 122, 217, 419 note.

Dubois, vi. 201, 202 of seq., 203, 205, 215 note.

Ducasse, "Prelis Historique," quoted, ix. 417.

Dudley and Ward, Lord, i. 17 note.

Dulac, i. 254.

Dumourier's system of fighting, iii. 411; vii. 62.

Dunstan, Admiral, his squadron, ii. 10 note, 254—commander of the English Fleet, 253—his sterling, manly character, 46, 47 of seq.—his strong commonsense, 259—his resolve, 46, 200, 201, 202, 205, 206, 211, 215, 220, 235, 243 note; ii. 232 note of seq.—his squadron, iv. 76—confronted by the inherent difficulty of navalily attacking Sebastopol, 256 note, 261—Lord Maitland's letter to, 264, 265, 266 of seq., 268, 269—his conference with his ship captains, 240—his attack on Sebastopol, 342 of seq., 300, 369, 373 note, 393, 400 note, 407, 410, 411; v. 26—hands over command of fleet, vii. 43.

Dundas, Mr Robert, his measure creating the third of the three new administrative forces, vii. 79, 70, 407 note.

Dunn, Lieut. Alexander, v. 238.

"Dunrobin" or "Sutherland" Hillfort, v. 77.

Dupin, President of the French Chamber of Deputies, i. 264.

Duroc, i. 246.

Duvnaskö, the village of, ii. 152 of seq.; iv. 12 of seq.

EAST INDY, vi. 28, 111, 140, 186 of seq., 203, 234 note, 236, 416 of seq.

EAST Rapper's Head, cutting of, vii. 40.

Eastern campaign, the phases of the, in their bearing upon the question of supply, vii. 84.

"Eastern Question," the, and its associations, i. 37.

Edlington, Captain, iii. 210, 210.

Edlington, Mr. Younger, vi. 136.

Elton, Captain, iv. 200 of seq., 219.

Edward, Prince of Wales—Vivian, ii. 126 note, iv. 242 note—his interview vi. 41, 46—his successful attack, 207, 214 note, 220, 224.

Edward, Captain, viii. 216.

Egerton, Colonel, iii. 141 of seq.—his magnificent charge at Inkermann, vi. 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 137, 138, 141, 154, 164, 215, 239 note, 237, 232, 234, 237, 239, 452—brilliant achievement by, viii. 213—death of, 214.

Egerton, Hon. Algernon, in conjunction with Mr Tower, administering Ordnance Army Fund, vii. 343 of seq.

Emerson, Dr., vi. 102, 110 of seq.

Egypt, the Czar preparing invasion of, to England, i. 13.

Electric field-telegraph, construction of, viii. 42.

Fleetwood, Lord, vi. 234.

Fleming, Lord, vii. 242, 244.

Florey, Mr., vi. 317.

Elliott, Captain, vi. 173 note.

Elst, Lieutenant Alexander, v. 23—his services in India, vi. 41, 23 of seq.—takes part at Scarlett's ride in the great Heavy Cavalry Charge, 104, 109, 111, 112, 131, 134 and note.

Elstot, Sir Frederick, his gifts and experiences, vii. 400, 401.

Elsmill, Captain, v. 146, 202.

Elphinstone, Lieutenant, vi. 138.

Elvington, Captain, vi. 26.

Elwick, the Oracle, i. 102.

Elwen, Captain, V.O., highly praised for his service in attack of the "Quatre," ix. 217.

Empire of the French, Louis Napoleon appointed to the 1848—his visit to England and his campaigning plan, vi. 14 of seq., 249, 251—causes of regarding, 240, 244, 250.

Environ, the French, in England, vii. 241.

England an antigen to political students of the Continent prior to 1861, i. in England, constitutional system, vi. 16—the touring gave the result of foreign affairs, i. 11—foreign policy of, 7 note, 20—his attitude on the independence of the Ottoman Empire, vi. England, her share in causing the war, ii. 141.

England Sir Richard General iii. 41, 177 note, 190, 190 note, 234, 235, 208; iv. 247 note; v. 74; vi. 5 note, 7, 28, 35 of seq., ix. 180 note.

England, the war administration of, vii. 11 of seq.

England, loss of the, by the fight on Mount Inkermann, vi. 402.

English, want of bonds to make a road, vii. 234.

English army, Queen of the, from crime, ii. 264.

Baptist army, the food provided for the, vii. 16—the state of 114—killing the troops, vii.—warm clothing, 120—provisions for the sick and wounded, 120.

Bagdad army, the sufferings of the, vii. 144, 160, 165, 167, 169, 171, 172, 174, 175, 184, 186, 187—mortality in the hospitals on the Dosphorus, 189, 210—the strategic decisions which resulted in obliging the Allies to withdraw upon the Chamaeonie steppes, 194, 196.

English fleet, extract from Admiralty return showing the number of men and the quantity of material landed from the, to aid the land forces in the siege of Sebastopol, down to the 25th of October, vii. 482.

Bagdad Heights, the, vi. 63, 100, 101, 117, 196, 263.

English soldiery, and its amount of work set upon the, viii. 129—their state of health, 131—overtasked, French and so, viii. 20, 261.

English trenches, refusal of the French to guard the, in pursuance of their Emperor's plan, viii. 261.

Balaclava. See it. 273.

Battering prepared after all by both Baryozov and the French Engineers to offer the best means of entrapment, iv. 481.

Ergenaischoff Captain, iv. 434.

Ermoloff, M. 12 note, 211 &c. &c.

Ernest, the villagers of and the Oxen, i. 23 & c., 21 1/2 note.

Espinasse's Brigade, v. 71.

Espinasse, General, vi. 12.

Espinasse, the, vi. 303.

Esmeat, General, vi. 200; vii. 577, 646, 648—the death of, Lord Raglan affected by, ix. 206. Lord Raglan's inability to attend the funeral of, 204.

Eupatoria, II. 816—the occupation of, viii. 307, 335, 377, III. 7; vii. 137, 427 note—condition of things in and near, vii. 45, 47, 48—Menachikoff's resolve to attack, 49, 50, 51, 52—the attack attempted by Khroueff, and repulse of the Russians by the Turks, 52, 53—hold the north by Tauris the troops unoccupied till after the close of the war, 53.

Eupatoria cable, the, viii. 217.

Europe a 1446, I. 4 standing armies, ii. personal government, iii. comparison between this system and that of governing through a council, iv. personal government in France, Russia, Austria, and Prussia, 10—administration of foreign affairs under the Sultan, 11—mixed system of English Government as bearing upon the conduct of foreign affairs, viii.—power of Russia, 14—power of Turkey, 16—the mounting army of the African empire, 20—Russia's message to Turkey, 21—aspect of Europe in reference to the Turkish empire, 24—policy of Austria, Prussia, France, England, and the lesser States of Europe, 26, 28.

Europe, lesser States of, foreign policy of the, i. 30.

Borodino, the, i. 303, 348, 367; ii. 21, 22 of seq., 37—English and French fleets enter the, 27, 124—the Russian flag in, 100, 104, 222, 242, 253, 262; iii. 212; v. 29, vii. 20, 264—proposal sent on the, viii. 24.

Evans (2nd Reg.), iii. 167.

Evans, Mr. De Lacy, General, at the Alma: the important and effective step he took personally, iii. 187—a skilful tactician, 195—he understood the battle, 196—the effective part he took in the battle with the part of his division left under his personal control, chap. i sec. 23—commanding at the Lesser Inkermann, his wise dispositions and prompt defeat of the assaulting force, v. 264-265. See also vi. 18, 20, 40 note, 53, 54, 56 note, 56, 57, 59, 137, 191, 196, 198, 199, 200, 204, 213 note, 214, v. 247 note v. 56, 173, 233 note, 274, 276, 340, 351, 366 of seq., vi. 9 note, 16 note, vii. 7, 160 & 1 note—the second editor, by, 402 and note.

Evans, William, iii. 152.

Ewart, Captain, vi. 26, 28, 29 note.

Expeditions undertaken by England in the seventeen years from Feb. 1795 to those of 1814 &c. &c. 404 of seq.

Eyre, General, ii. 279, vi. 84; ix. 200—the attack victoriously led by, on 10th of June, 205—he is wounded, 207, 208, 213, 217—the English strengthen their hold of the ground captured by, 210.

Folly, General, his brigade, ix. 300 of seq., 354.

Fonthill, Captain, vi. 268.

Foxton, Colonel, vi. 224.

Faubourg, counter-espionage of the, viii. 187; ix. 201 of seq.

Fawcett, M., i. 348.

Fawcett's brigade, ix. 106, 104 note.

Fay, Captain, vi. 48 note, 504 note, 51 seq.

Fedoroff, Colonel, advanced, v. 272, 273, 280—gravely wounded, 280; vi. 471 note.

Felloutine Heights, v. 179 of seq.; vi. 31.

Felloutine Hills, the, v. 22, 74, 201, 212, 213 of seq., 211 note, 222, 227, 230, 232, 233 note, 234, 235, 236, 238, 239, 247; vi. 42.

Poyntz, General, v. 159.
 Porth, Major-General, II. 211.
 Pickering, Captain, III. 222 note.
 'Fifteenth', die hard, i<sup>o</sup>, vi. 398, also
     ix. 270 and note.
 Pidder, Mr., Commissary-General, v. 300;
     vi. 3, 34—his authority a source of evil, 37, 104, 110, 422, 428, 429—his request to the Treasury Board for 100 tons of hay, 110, 113 et seq.—his administration, 322, 324, 326, 328, 424, 425, 426, 470, 472, 478.
 Pin, Contra, i. 38 note.
 Fisher (Sub.), v. 144.
 Fisher, General, iv. 241.
 Fisher, Lieut. A'Court, the engineer officer with Yeo's column at the attack of the Redan, 18th of June, ix. 188, 190—his words to Yeo at the verge of the abattis, and what followed, 191, 192, 193, 194, 196, 212.
 Foch, Gen. de la Châtaignier, III. 154, 214.
 Force, Gen. Lord Viscount, v.
     142, 227.
 Forceps on 45 note, & 470 note et
     al. in the 1st vol. 113—note 460.
 Flanagan, General, the, v. 300 note vi et seq., 327, 328, 329 et seq.—propares his troops to attack the 3d, 4th, 5th Regt. 124, 125, 126 et seq., 127
     et seq., 128, 129, 130, 131, 132
     et seq., 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138
     et seq., 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145
     et seq.; ix. 97, 139, 143, 225, 231, 279, 278
     —proposed French assault on the, 275, 282.
 Flaubert, Count, i. 206.
 Flank march by the Allies: Lord Raglan favours an attack on the South Side, II. 268 reasons for a flank march, 262—Sir John Burgoyne and his Memorandum, 296 et seq.—Lord Raglan instructs him to proposed the flank march to St Arnaud, 296—
     Lord Raglan's conference with St Arnaud, 298—determination to attack the town, 300—plan of St Arnaud, 400—Lord Raglan's uncertainty as to St Arnaud's motives, 401—the avoidance of the Star Fort,
     the second of the 'lost occasions,' 405—the Allies still in ignorance of the enemy's plans and movements,
     iv. 2—virulence of cholera at Belbeu, 4—Lord Raglan's dispositions for the flank march, 4—commitment of the march, 7—Lord Raglan effects a reconnaissance, 16—comes in contact with a 9th—an force which proved to be the rear of Prince Metesch's army, 18—his way of dealing with the emergency, 14—re-treath of the Russians, 17—movement of Russian troops, 19—the march resumed, 21—surrounds of Balaklava, 22—Lord Raglan's estimate on recovering an communication, 23—
     he retains possession of Balaklava, 24—his orders to the 9th, that a road in front of, 25—Oulhert's march, 26
     —cession of St Arnaud's command, 26—the command resigned into the hands of Gouraud, 27—death of St Arnaud, 40—statement by Sir Edward Waterfall regarding, 435, 437.
 Flank march by Prince Meteschhoff with his field army iv. chap. V.
 Fleets, the, ordered to move to the neighbourhood of the Dardanelles, i.
     189—they enter the Bosphorus, II. 39.
 Flory, General, i. 235—his career as a soldier, 239—he reaches Algiers and leads St Arnaud, 241—gratitude of the brethren of the Lycée due to,
     ii. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 224, 225, 226.
 Flory, Sergeant-Major, killed, II. 260.
 Food of the French army, vii. 210—
     Lord Raglan on, 400 note.
 Food the, provided for the English army, vii. 119.
 Foreign the want of, vii. 109—successes to England for hay, 110, 111 et seq., 115, 231, 473.
 Forbes, Mr., iv. 261.
 Fouche, M. v. 108—his encounter with a Russian battalion, 108, 109, 154, 164.
 Four Ridge, the, vi. 69 et seq., 100, 102, 103 et seq., 262, 311 3000 et seq., 376,
     381, 399 et seq., 410, 450.
 Forey, General, i. 264, 265; II. 26, 100, 201, 323; iv. 226, 260, 292; vi. 8 note
     —position of his French siege corps,
     ii. 7, 81, 82, 83, 471 note, 483 note—removed from command of 1st Corps d'Armée, viii. 41.
 Forrest, Major, v. 144.
 Foster, Captain, v. 144, 150.
 Foster, Mr. M., iv. 261.
 Four Demands, the, viii. 216, 220—attitude of Austria-Turkey 21—consentance of, by Czar, 21—new formulation of, 216.
 Fourgeot, Colonel, vi. 261.
 Fox, Mr., vii. 52, 480.
 Foy, General, iv. 260 note.
 France, Government of, in its bearing upon the conduct of foreign affairs,
     i. 6 one of the Great Powers of Europe, 24.
 France, her share in creating the war,
     i. 108—the war administration of
     viii. 4.
 Frederic Joseph the Emperor, i. 30,
     ii. 6 et seq. the effect of personal government by 10.
 Frederic the Great, II. 68.
 Frederic William, King, conduct of foreign affairs iv. v. 283 his reclusion from Conference of Great Powers, 218, 221.

French army, the character of, II. 201 et seq.—loss of the, v. 129.

French army, the sufferings and losses sustained by the, vii. 151 et seq.—extent to which the sufferings and losses of the French as a whole become masked from observation on the Chersonese, 162, 163.

French army, morale of, under Caulaincourt, VIII. 302—Lord Raglan on it.—Remarks on 303—effect of Prussian on, &c., &c. seeing of the general, towards Lord Raglan, ix. 324, 326.

French attempt to annex an English trophy, II. 318.

French fleet, the, suddenly ordered to Calais, i. 107.

French infantry ceased to take part in the battle of Inkermann, authorities showing the time when the, vi. 317.

French, loss of the, by the flight on Mount Inkermann, vi. 456.

French losses, the, much more than compensated by reinforcements, vi. 215.

French reconnaissances of Balaklava plain, VIII. 60.

French Republic, state of the, in November 1851, i. 215.

French troops, effect of anxious suspense upon, I. 224.

French, troubled councils of the, VIII. 220 et seq.

French works on Mount Inkermann, still in construction of, vni. 20, 60.

Friedrich Effen-H., Turkish Minister for Foreign Affairs, i. 105.

Fried-Parks and Neutrality principle, VIII. 223 note.

Furious, the warship, VIII. 61.

Fusiliers, 7th, note respecting the operations of, III. 411.

Gagaria, Prince, I. 92.

Gale, Thomas, VI. 242.

Gallipoli, II. 184, 192, 193, 201; VII. 213, 402.

Gambier, Colonel, VI. 273 and note.

Gen. the, at battle of Inkermann, VI. 170, 196—imperative need of troops at, 220, 231—left open, 293, 458.

Garai, Prince. See Gagaria.

Garden Batteries, the, IV. 420; V. 187 note.

Garden-wall Battery, the, II. 207.

Gardner, Colonel, IX. 21.

Garnier, IX. 162.

Garrard, II. 158.

Garrison, strength of the, grounds of statement as to, IV. 487.

Gasson, Lieut. H., IV. 802.

Gavin, Dr H., VII. 301.

Gaudre, Captain, his 'Mémoires pour servir,' &c., III. 205 note, 18 note, IV. 204 note, 218, 234, 254 note, 264 et seq.

Gaußköt, IX. 68—operations at, 67, 77.

German Confederation, the, and their attitude on the Eastern Question, II. 124.

Gervais Battery, the, IX. 143, 156, 161 et seq.—the French operations against, 197, 201, 202 note—recapture of the, 203.

Gheith, IX. 68—operations at, 78.

Gibson, Lieut., VI. 148 note.

Gibert, VI. 279 note.

Gippe, III. 219.

Giuvera, II. 214—The Battle of, II.—arrival of Gortchakov at, 214, 217; v. 12 note.

Gladstone, Mr. the share he had in bringing about the war, II. 34, 46, 47 et seq., 168, 144 et seq.

Glasbrook, Captain, VI. 244.

Glyn (Sub.), V. 141.

Glyn, Lieutenant, II. 214.

Glyn, Mr St Leger, VII. 244.

Goad, Captain, V. 229, 234, 237.

Goad, Cornet G. M., V. 229 note.

Golden Horde, the, II. 54.

Golden Horn, the I. 543, VII. 181.

Golden's General, brigadier, strength of, VI. 20 note, II., 300, 304, 306—his command, 302, 307, 308—he is slain, 311.

Goodlax, Captain, IV. 239 note; V. 271—his adventure with the snowy, 277—his body of volunteers, 46 note, 284; VI. 24 note, 26—interposition of his moving pocket, 26, 161.

Gordon, Colonel Alexander, the and quadriennials of the Commercial Commissioners on, VI. 228-4.

Gordon, Lieutenant Charles, IX. 184—a soldier marked out for strange destinies, 184.

Gordon, Lieut. Sir William, V. 220, 234, 235.

Gordon, Major, V. 12 note—in night attack on Woronzoff Ridge, VIII. 92—in command of Engineers against Kerich, 202.

Gorringe's or Right Attack, IV. 197, 421, 425; VI. 7 et seq., 410—Kantchaka Lunette assailed by, VIII. 189—fighting for lodgments in front of, 191; IX. 113, 122.

Gortchakov, Prince Alexander, at Vienna Conference, VIII. 219—character of, 222—as Minister at Austrian Court, 216, 254.

Gortchakov, Prince Michael and the evacuation of the Principalities, I. 412 note—he crosses the Lower Danube, II. 121, 214, 215—the forces under his command, III. 14, 61, 62 note—his introduction of Todleben, IV. 206—the strength of his army—corps at Inkermann, VI. 20, 28, 48, 49, 48, 49, 50, 52 et seq., 214, 224, 225, 227—his attitude, 202, 204, 206, 208, 211.

—losses of, with 20,000 fresh troops, 400—the cause, 40, 402, 404
—assumes command of Russian forces, viii. 119—fitness of choice, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 47, 95, 219 of seq., 201.
Gorchakov, Prince Peter, commands the forces opposed to the English at Alma, iii. 147 of seq., 208 note, 209—his narrative, 618 note, 247, 263—on the Russian retreat, 204 note, 612.
Gough, Major, iii. 158.
Gout and its power, vii. 401 note.
Government, personal, i. 4—comparison between this system and that of governing through a council, 4—by Prince Klemens, Archduke, and Francis, 19—effect of, by the Czar, ii. 124—by the Emperor of Austria, 126—by the King of Prussia, 126—by the French Emperor, 126.
Government, the new, the war measures of the, vi. 304—continued anger of our people, 304 of seq.
Goss, Lieut.-Colonel, vi. 304.
Grace, Colonel, ii. 208.
Graham, General, iv. 307, 308 note, 308 of seq.
Graham, General Sir Gerald, ix. 162, 171, 172, 173, 175, 180—the admiration bestowed on his hider-party, 161, 164.
Graham, Lieut., at April bombardment, viii. 154, 164—struck down by round-shot, 168 and note, 174.
Graham, Sir James, iv. 308 note, 308 note; vii. 282, 307, 400—refuses a receiving ship, 433 note; ix. 452.
Grand-Dukes Nicholas and Michael, arrival of, at Sebastopol, viii. 79—significance of their presence, 79.
Grant, Colonel Thornton, his command at Inkermann, vi. 28, 29, 114, 115, 122, 124, 154, 164; ix. 119 of seq.
Grant, Mr., vi. 400 note.
Gravelle, Lieut., ii. 134 note.
Grapeshot wound on the head not resulting in death, ix. 312.
Graves, Lieut., and his hider-party, ix. 116.
Greathead, Lieut., iv. 442.
Greek and Latin Churches, quarrel between the monks of the, in relation, i. 38.
Greek Church in Turkey, the, and a Russian Protectorate, i. 124, 151, 154—desire for the protectorate of, a cause of the war, 277; iv. 102, 104.
Greenhill, Mr. Henry, vii. 401 note.
Greenhill trenches, the, iv. 300 note.
'Green Hill,' the, iv. 247, 264, 266, 315, 420, 424.
Greenwood, Captain, ii. 130.
Greg, Major, iv. 72.
Grenadier Guards, ii. 220 of seq.—loss of the, 274—embarkation contained by the, vi. 181.
Grenadier Guards and Sir George Brown, ii. 412.
Greville, Lord, and 'The Times' administration, vi. 401 note.
Greville, Captain, vi. 204.
Greville, Finch, Captain, vi. 204.
Grey Lord, ii. 36; ix. 363.
Graves, General, i. 45 note.
Griffith, Colonel, v. 117, 120.
Guards, the, iii. 120—the rivalry between the, and the line, 120, 121.
Guards of British Teacher, formation of, viii. 30, 300.
Gubbins, Captain, vi. 78 note.
Gubbins, Lieutenant, viii. 216 note.
Gull, General, vii. 31.
Guthrie, Mr., President of the College of Surgeons, vii. 407 note.
Gwyn, General, ii. 306.
Gwilt, Captain, viii. 216 note.

Hadji-Bekhet, iii. 8.
Hadji road, iii. 81.
Hahn Paula, i. 42.
Haines, Colonel, vi. 309—undertakes the defence of the Barrier, 304, 306, 371, 387, 410, 434, 436 of seq., 438.
Halford, Lieutenant, i. 133.
Lia-catt, Major, v. 294, 327.
Hall, Dr., vii. 120—his examination of the hospitals in the Levant, 120—his reports on the medical service, 404.
Haly, Colonel, iii. 190.
Hawkins, Admiral, ii. 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 208, 211, 214 note; iii. 20 note; iv. 100 note, 272, 317, 320 of seq.—his signal to his fleet, 204, 205, 206 of seq., 414.
Hawkins, Captain, ii. 204.
Hamilton, Colonel Sir Charles, ii. 202, 203, 410.
Hamilton, Colonel F., vi. 106 note.
Hamilton, Lieutenant Robert, iii. 210.
Hamilton, Mr., in Balaclava, ii. 210; viii. 44.
Hamilton, v. 77.
Harley, Captain, v. 272 note—he arrives with three guns, vi. 182—he successful use of the pieces, ii., 184, 185, 245.
Harley's, Colonel, 'The Campaign of Sebastopol,' iii. 245 note.
Hampton, Cornet, v. 180.
Hancock, Mr., iv. 200 note.
Hanley, v. 117.
Harbour ravine, the, iv. 202, 204.
Hardenberg, i. 204.
Harding, Captain, vi. 200 note, 214.
Harding, Lieut.-Colonel, vii. 414 note, 447 note.
Hardinge, Colonel, at Inkermann, vi. 221, 222.
Hardinge, Lord, General Alvy's letter to on the day of Sebastopol, iv. 210; v. 21, 26—Commander-in-chief at the Horse Guards, vii. 21, 45, 170, 276—his general order on the death of Lord Raglan, ix. 289.

 Hardy, Captain, vi. 56 note, 207 note, 224.
 Hare, iii. 206.
 Harries, Captain, vi. 222.
 Hartopp, Lieut., v. 140, 220, 222.
 Harvard, Lieut., vi. 274, 274, 275.
 Herbert, Mount, v. 28.
 Hassan Pasha, ii. 308, 310, 311, 312.
 Haughton, Lieut. Powell, v. 206, 207, 244 note.
 Hay, the delay in sending to the troops, vii. 1.1, 1.3, 1.7, 1.8.
 Heygate, Colonel, iii. 219.
 Head-quarter Staff, expenses of the Government to remove Lord Raglan's, vii. 202.
 Health from the percentage of sick, note showing the French regiments interfered with the judgment of judging, vii. 441.
 Health of our army, improvement in the, after 2nd February, vii. 234—restored health and strength, 204.
 Heath, Captain, v. 106.
 Heavy Brigade, the great charge of, under Scarlett, v. 94 of seq.
 Heighs, the, ix. 225, 226 of seq.
 Hellespont, the, i. 232, 233 of seq.
 Hennegau, Comet, v. 238, 237.
 Henri IV., saved crew of St. L., viii. 34.
 Henry, Captain, in command of No. VII. battery on the 14th of April, viii. 176, 177, 180, 181.
 Henry, Mr., iv. 36 note.
 Henry, Sergeant-Major, vi. 222.
 Hepburn, Colonel, iii. 216.
 Herbert, Colonel Percy, iii. 50 note, 54 note, 59, v. 275; vi. 56 of seq., 77, 94, 96, 102, 104 note, 114, 224, 144, 221, 229, 231, 232, 412 note.
 Herbert, Mr. Sidney, at the War Office, vii. 404 note—his evidence before the Sebastopol Committee, 259, 307, 324, 330, 364, 365 of seq., 406, 408, 409.
 Herketh, vi. 226.
 Hewitt, Mr., v. 271—his fire from the Lancaster gun, 304, vi. 59 note, ix. 18.
 Heytesbury, Lord, ii. 64 note.
 Hibbert, Colonel, v. 273 note; ix. 190.
 Hibbert, Lieut., iii. 216.
 Hiblak, Mount, v. 29, 30.
 Higginson, Captain, vi. 208 of seq.
 Highland Brigade, advance of the, to the left bank of the Alma, iii. 130, 226, 227—their engagement with several Russian columns, 258, 270, 271, 272, 274.
 Hillman, Lieut., iv. 451.
 Hill Bend, vi. 77 of seq., 143—the state of the fight at, 144, 174, 184 note, 198, 207, 214, 215, 445 note.
 Hill, Edward, vi. 242, 273, 275 of seq.
 Hind, ii. 219 of seq.
 Johnson, Adjutant, iii. 216.
 Hedge, Colonel, vi. 148 and note, 244, 245, 254, 255.
 Hodson, J. 216.
 Hoey, Colonel, vii. 20, 107; 'Holland,' iv. 71.
 Home Government, the harmonious concert, iii. 216.
 Horse Ridge, v. 274 of seq.; vi. 40, 70 of seq., 88, 100 of seq., 111, 218, 142 of seq., 154, 155 of seq., 176, 184 of seq., 197, 206, 208, 209, 210 of seq., 206 of seq., 211 of seq., 238 of seq.—the combat on the, 241, 242, 273, 305, 347 of seq., 311 of seq., 411, 417, 440, 458 of seq.
 Home resources, vi. 211.
 Hood, G. 241, 251, 252 and note, 253 note, 252 note—his manœuvre, 252, 253, 261, 267 of seq., 268, 269 note, 268 of seq., 269 of seq.—death of, iv. 412—Lord Raglan on, 46, 474.
 Hopkins, Captain, vi. 56 note, 60 note.
 Hopkiss, iii. 167.
 Horne, Colonel, vi. 34, 207, 210, 204, 207, 201.
 Horse Guards, the, vii. 21 of seq., 41 of seq., 51.
 Horse Guards, the, before 1778, vii. 402.
 Hornford, Colonel, vi. 56 note, 195, 215—strength of his force, 234 note, 254, 256, 266 note, 371, 387, 423, 424, 426.
 Morton, Lieutenant-Commander, ii. 11, 14.
 Hospital, General, the, at Sevastopol, vii. 120 of seq.—defective equipment of, 220.
 Hospital, note regarding the excess of admissions late, vii. 417.
 Hospitals, English, the cause of mal-administration in the, vii. 206, 207, 208, 209, 210—the hospital at Kilkili, 261—the one on a new principle at Smyrna, 264—hospitals in the Crimea, 264, 265—Miss Nightingale, &c., 265, 270—the untiring zeal of our medical officers, 281, 282, 284, 285, 294, 295.
 Hospitals, mortality in the, on the Bosphorus, vii. 190.
 Hospitals, the French, vii. 258.
 Hospiot, L. 194.
 House of Commons, motion in, for a Committee of Inquiry, vii. 261—recognition of Lord Aberdeen's Ministry, &c.—formation of Lord Palmerston's Government, 263—the two displaced Ministers, &c.—general import of the change of Ministry, 264—Lord John Russell attacked in, viii. 326, 329—justice of attack in, 325—vote of, regarding war, 46.
 Hugo, Victor, i. 202.
 Hunt, ii. 19, 144, vi. 207 and note, 411 note.
 Hussey, Major, iii. 212.
 Humphry, Assistant-Surgeon, vi. 141.

Bent, Captain, v. 144-155—the charge of his squadron, 156, 342 note.

Bent, General, v. 238, 294.

Hunter, v. 1-7.

Hurdle, Colonel, iv. 271; v. 38.

Hurricane of 14th November, vi. 149—the destruction caused by, 146—Lord Raglan's sense of the disaster, 145—his measures, 41.

Hutchinson, vii. 56.

Hutton, Captain, v. 298, 307.

Ikkenskof battalions, the, vi. 166 et seq.

Ilyinsky, Captain, iv. 312.

Imperialists' men of courage. Officers generally made acquainted with, viii. 10.

Inglin, Captain, v. 188, vi. 208 and note.

Inglin, Major, at Inkerman, vi. 306 note.—on the 10th of June, vi. 377 et seq.

Inkerman, Attack on von Losen, v. 367 36th Oct., 46. Balaklava still the object of the enemy's designs, 46.—effect of the Balaklava battle upon Losen's troops, 47—on other troops the spirit of other Russian troops, 366—its effect on the garrison of Sevastopol, 46.—object of the attack there planned, 46.—circumstances giving an advantage to the Lower Inkerman combat, 369—the enemy's dominion over the northern part of Mount Inkerman, 46.—his plan of attack, 370—General Rostov saw the movement, 46—troops occupying the Carriageway Ravine, 371—Fedorov's advance, 372—his engagement with our pickets, and continued advance to Shell Hill, 373—his guns on Shell Hill, 374—engaged by those of Evans, 46.—General Rostov's troops in the spirit in which they fought, 375—the spirit in which they fought, 375—the policy of Evans, 375—advance of the separate column, 377—Captain Goodliffe's adventure with the enemy, 46.—progress of the combat in the Carriageway Ravine, 380—continuation of the enemy's efforts on Mount Inkerman, 46.—defeat of his columns advancing in support, 380—his entire defeat on Mount Inkerman, 380—Hewitt's fire from the Garrison gun, 384—the enemy also defeated in the Carriageway Ravine, 46.—duration of the combat, 386—the results, 386—its path, 46.—its effect upon the military of our XI Division, 46.

Inkerman. Battle on vi. 1—state of the army and measures to the beginning of Nov. 1854, 46.—approach of the peril incurred by giving the enemy time, 46.—reinforcements despatched to Menschikoff, 2—strength of the Russians on the eve of Inkerman, 46.—of the Allies, 4—motives for immediate action on part of the Russian field army, 4—position of the Allied armies, 6—their left, 6—the primary task of these troops, 7—the distances from Mount Inkerman, 46.—Coddington's brigade and its position, 46.—disposition of the troops which covered the siege, 8—the French Army of Observation, 11—Bouquet's primary duty, 46—conditions under which he might march to the support of the English at, 46.—Quarebert's Turkish auxiliaries, 12—Vivoy's brigade, 46.—duties devolving upon Sir Colin Campbell and Vivoy, 12—position of the Allied cavalry, 46.—the want of any collected body of infantry reserves, 46.—circumstances under which the defense of Mount Inkerman was left, in the first instance, to a small body of men, 46.—Lord Raglan's presumption of the condition of things reported to our Government on the 3d of November, 46—anxiety in England and France, 46—dispositions for a general engagement, 46—the conflict of 1st Nov. regarded as a general action, 46.—disposition of the Russian forces on the eve of the battle, 46—the enemy's protected front of battle, 46—numerous strengths of the attacking armies, 46—the numbers the enemy could spare for aggressive purposes, 46—want of reinforcing power possessed by the Allies, 46.—the enemy's plan, 47—the immediate object of the battle contemplated by the enemy, 47—advantages to be gained from the anticipated success of the attack, 46—measures tending to influence the soul of the Russian soldiery, 47—on and early morning of the 4th, 47—a review in the English camp, 47—the English camp on the eve of the 5th of November, 47—the early morning of the 5th November in the English camp, 47—the best anticipations of the Allies, 47—Lord Raglan in the morning, 47—Coddington based a map distribution, 47—Lord Raglan's conclusion, 47—his measures and imminent departure for, 47—great re-position of the forces under Gortchakov and 47—he at present on the British side, 47—the next division to Prince Gorchakov's corps, 47—its operations, 47—the Guards in 4 divisions in the front, 47.—Oulone. Upton's measures, 47—Colonel Cadogan's mission to Bouquet, 47—Bouquet's troops detained for a while by Gortchakov's measures, 47—and afterwards by mistaken assumption of Upton and Cadogan's out, 6.—Bouquet's clear perception of the enemy's real purpose, 42—the reinforcements which Bouquet, at intervals, was able to bring to the field of Inkermann, 46—the power of Sir George Grey's and Sir G. Bentinck's troops to hold, 48—circumstances under which Gorchakov's force became paralysed, 50—operations on the Sevastopol front, 54—the garrison forces before 8.30 A.M., 56.—General Roberts's endeavour to draw reinforcements for Inkermann from his siege corps, 56.—troops remaining with Forey at 9.30 A.M., 58.—Timofieff's sortie, 58—the part taken by the garrison in the Karabyl Fabrique, 58.—English reinforcements marched towards Mount Inkermann, 58.—advantages resulting from General Codrington's firmness on the Victoria Ridge, 61.—result of the efforts made by the garrison, 62—general failure of the enemy's auxiliary operations, 66—the enemy's main attack, on 7 Sept. on Mount Inkermann.

INKERMAN, THE FIGHT ON MOUNT, the ground and its defences, vi, 64 of retreat to cover, 64—on 7 Sept. the Russian army might be aided in the battle, 76—northern half of Mount Inkermann left in the enemy's power, 78—on 7 Sept. on the English position, 78.—strength of the force under Pennelotter in case of Mount Inkermann, 82—arrangement of the Picket system, 86—the chain of outposts maintained on Mount Inkermann, 86—the enemy's confused and disorderly movements, 86—Gorchakov's written orders for the attack on, 86.—the subsidiary directions framed by Balmontoff and Pauloff, 86—interposition of Denzemburg, 87—his first set of instructions, 88—his subsequent attempts to overrule the accepted plan, and cause Balmontoff to attack by the Victoria Ridge, 88.—the enemy's final determination, 88—Balmontoff's final resolve, 88—its effect, 90—the ascent of Mount Inkermann as about to be actually undertaken, 90.

FIRST PERIOD, FROM 9.30 A.M. TO 7.30 P.M., 90—Balmontoff's march, 91—continuation of Balmontoff's march, 91—on advance in order of battle, 91.—Captain Goodlack's interposition, 91—the reserves, 91.—Balmontoff's undisturbed advance to the verge of Shell Hill, 91—the English pickets at night, Grant, Sargent, Carmichael, Morgan, 91—part taken by Captain Morgan, 93—the 2d Division called to arms as usual before sunrise, 97—the role of the pickets, 98—the now pickets, 98—the enemy at length discovered and checked by Rowland's rocket, 98.—Russian batteries established on Shell Hill, 98—the first measures taken on the Home Ridge, 98.—the direction of the Balaika column, 99—troops in the camp of the 2d Division, 99—the ease with which the Russians had time for carry out their enterprise, 100—the plan of defence conceived by Evans, 99—the one adopted by Pennelotter 101—the position taken up by his regiments, 102—scampering of the force left to defend the heights, 103—these dispositions practically invincible, 104—Pennelotter's control not superseded by Lord Raglan's presence on the field, 105—Lord Raglan's order to bring up guns &c on the siege-train park, 106—Solomons' intention at this time, 106—the occurrence which changed his resolve, 109—Grant's encounter with a Russian column, 110—acceleration of the impending contest, 110—commencement of Balmontoff's attack, 111—simultaneous advance of 4000 men belonging to Pauloff's corps, 111—advance of the 1st Division, 111—on the front of the banner battery, 113—their seizure of the work, 114—junction of the Borodino with the Taroutine battalions, 116—their array, 116.—the enemy's entire front of battle at this time, 116.—formations adopted by his assaulting forces, 116—general character of the attack now proceeding, 117—numbers of the enemy at this time engaged, 118—his numbers, 118—numbers available for the defence, 118—arrival of the first English reinforcements, 118—operations of the Connaught Rangers, 118—advance of Townshend's battery, 119—three of his guns exposed to the power of the Russian column, 119—singular conflict undertaken by Lieutenant Miller and his artillermen, 119—the three English guns in the possession of the Russians, 124—some casualties of the Connaught Rangers retreat, 125—the pursuit of Grant, 126—result of the Russian attack up to this time, 126.—arrival of General Bulwer's force, 126—on the 12th, 126—Bulwer, 127—his advance upon the enemy's approaching masses, 127—the forces he was confronting, 128—the quality of his small force, 128—hesitation of the Russians, 129—General Bulwer's terms of order, 129.—Lieutenant Hugh Clifford's exploit against the Russian column, 129—on the 13th, 129—the valley of the Tchir, 129—over-

Show of the four masses forming the Russian front, 134—overthrow of the close column in their rear, 46.—mélée of intermingled companies, 46.— Egerton's unrelenting pursuit, 136—the 77th at length halted in an advanced position, 137.—General Belisarioff mortally wounded, 138.— Egerton's retention of the ground he had won, 46.—retreat of the 3d and 4th Catherineburg battalions, 46.—recovery of the lost English guns, 138.—position taken up and held by Jeffreys, 141—names of the officers who took part in Egerton's charge, 46.—the order of the successive combats, 141.—resolute advance further east of six Russian battalions, 142—separation of one battalion from the others, 46.—continued advance of the remaining five battalions, 143—their overthrow under a fire of case-shots, 46.—their retreat, pursued by foot-soldiers, 46.

The state of the fight as now at Mt. Head, 144—Bellair's perception of the emergency, 144—charge executed by Bellair with his men, 146—overthrow and retreat of the Kolinian column, 46.—order of 200 Russians between the road of the Quarry Battery and the Sandbag Battery, 46.—the sole English force opposing it, 147—advance of two more battalions, 46.—Mawlevor's counter-advance with a wing of the 30th Regiment, 46.—his charge, 148—overthrow of the two Borodino battalions immediately confronting him, 46.— retreat of the four Borodino battalions, 149—advance of General Adams in person with the 41st Regiment, 46.—his defeat of the 4000 men between the two defeated body of Russians, 149—his flight to the field of battle, 150—circumstances under which the Taroutine and the Borodino regiments fought, 151—result of the first or early morning's fighting, ending at 7.30, 152—comparison of the numbers engaged in the early fight, 154—the strength of the ground not taken advantage of by the English infantry, 155—effect of the mist on the respective forces, 46.—quality of the English officer when isolated with only a small body of men, 144—the English troops that had won a series of successes, 46.—effect of the early fog on Homs Ridge, 156—failure of the enemy's numerical strength in such respects as, 157, 46.—circumstances which marked the defeat of the twenty battalions, and impaired its moral effect, 158.

Second Period—1.30 A.M. to 4.00

A.M.—fresh troops and guns brought forward by the enemy, 46.—Davout's assumption of the command over both the corps d'armée, 46.—Prince Menschikoff and the Grand-Dukes, 46.—Davout's dispositions, 151—advance of his 16,000 men to a 1400 men column of the English, 148—the neutralised part of our force, 46.—one-third part of the troops at Pennafather's disposal left to watch the western skirts of Mount Inkerman, 154—continued apprehension of attacks from the west, as, for example, on the part of Pennefather, 46.—action of the two assault-battalions, 146—the rifle fire maintained against the enemy's artillerymen by some of the 1000 men detained on our left, 157—the two other third parts of the English infantry, 46—the order given to the southward disposition of the collected troops remaining to Pennefather, 155—the approaching reinforcements, 155—continued impression of the English as to the dimensions of the army, 171—conduct of the fight still left to Pennefather, 46.—Lord Raglan and his staff, 171—the enemy's entire change of his fighting battalions not perceptible to the English at the time, 174—the error which began to entangle our troops on wrong ground, 46.—the force near the Sandbag Battery, 175—Armstrong's communication with the Duke of Cambridge, 46.—the position of General Adams as against the approaching forces, 46.—the fight maintained by Adams towards his front, 177—the guns of Jacks, 46.—their effect, 178—General Adams, 179—continuation of the fighting, 180—Adams forced back, 46.—bird capture of the Sandbag Battery, 181—the force under Adams drawn back towards Mount Head, 46.—Adams mortally wounded, 46.—arrival of Captain Bicaley with three guns, 181—his successful use of the guns, 46.—repulsion of the troops who had fought up at a time, 46.—the being on the road between Mount Head and the English forces for the moment, 46.—protection given to the English by the 1000 men newly brought, 184—the Russians and the French positions at Mt. Head, 46.—course taken by the Duke of Cambridge for informing himself, 185—advance of the battalions of Guards, 46.—array of the forces opposed to them, 46.—the Duke, being all un molested on his left, continued his advance, 186—strength of the force 4000 strong opposing the Duke's 700 men, 187—charge of the Guards

202, 148—fourth capture of the Sandbag Battery, 20.—the enemy able to rally in safety beneath the ledge of the cliff, 20.—retiring eastward, 20.—the Sandbag Battery, 199—combats subsisted by the Grenadiers, 20.—advance of the Scots Fusiliers against two columns on the north front, 190—interposition of the Duke of Cambridge, and change of direction, 191—interposition of Bonwick, and countermarch of the battalion, 20.—the mass opposed to them, 20.—first charge of the Scots Fusiliers, 192—charge of the Scots Fusiliers by the Grenadiers, 20.—position of the two battalions of the Guards now formed up together, 20.—the enemy's pause of repeating his attacks, 193—conditions under which the Guards had to fight, 20.—the Sandbag Battery vacated, 104—entered by the Russians, and repulsed by Dassier, 20.—second charge of the Scots Fusiliers, 20.—third charge of the same force, 195—the Duke of Cambridge's expedition in search of reinforcements, 20.—the Gap, 196—imprudence of reinforcing the Guards without also securing the Gap, 20.—reinforcements nevertheless obtained, 20.—successes drawn from the 2d Division, 197—from the 4th Division, 198—the waste of power caused by drawing these successes to the Kitapur, 20.—failure of the Duke's application to Cathcart, 199.

Arrival of two French battalions, 199—their reception on the battlefield, 200—failure of the English endeavours to make them advance, 20.—impatience of our people with the two battalions, 201—the Duke's return to the Kitapur, 204—the results of the expedition in search of reinforcements, 202—Dassierberg's preparations for his next attack, 205—fire of Russian artillery, 20—advances of the small battalions, 204—comparison of numbers, 20.—the great column advancing from the north, 20.—the fire of the Scots Fusiliers, 200—attack of the 2d Division, 201—losses, 20.—the losses of the Scots Fusiliers, 20.—his two first wounds, 20.—his visit to the Sandbag Battery, 20.—Beloghinik troops on the top of the parapet, 20.—and 20.—the third wound, 20.—devotion of the command upon Colonel F. Seymour, 208—the measures he took, 20.—renunciation of the Sandbag Battery by the English, 20.—their change of position, 20.—the Sandbag battery entered by the Russians, 209—the opposing forces standing at bay, 210

—charge of the Grenadiers, 211—the Russians overthrown on each front by the Guards, 211—second capture of the Sandbag Battery, 212—enemy cessation of the enemy's retreat, 213—his return to the conflict, 213—false position of the Grenadiers within the work, 213—reinforcements brought to the Kitapur, 214—the Duke of Cambridge's intended disposition of them, 215—the Gap still open, 216—the artless & ignorant of the fresh troops, 216—the real exigency not met by this accession of reinforcements, 216—the general tenor of the fight on the Kitapur after the accession of the reinforcements, 217—attack on the north front and the left shoulder of the Sandbag Battery, 218—the result of a fail on the north front, 219—abrupt character of the fight on the eastern front, 219—the last of the enemy's attacks on the Kitapur, 224—its defeat by some men of the Coldstreams, 20.

Sir George Cathcart's arrival, 204—his conversation with Pennelather, 205—the great bulk of Cathcart's troops distributed piecemeal, 206—the small force of 400 men remaining under Cathcart's personal control, 207—its importance, 20.—the vice of the position maintained at the Sandbag Battery, 220—Lord Raglan's determination, 20.—imperative need of troops at the Gap, 200—endeavours to induce Cathcart to act in the required direction, 204—his own conception, and his consequent resistance to entreaties, 20.—Lord Raglan's order to Cathcart, 201—the state of Cathcart's temper in the Crimea, 202—opinion as to the cause which induced him to disobey orders, 203—his determination to attack the enemy's extreme left, 20.—one of the effects of this resolve, 20.—his fatal descent from the hill ground & commencement of the fight on the Kitapur, 204—duty of a part of the 2d division of Guards to assist the 2d and 4th battalions, 20.—Cathcart's charge with some troops of the 2d division, separation of the troops in the Sandbag Battery to the 2d and 4th battalions, 20.—crossing over the parapet and out on the ledge, 20.—weakness of the defenders at the base of the hill, 205—losses of the 2d and 4th battalions, 20.—his first attempt to make the main charge, 20.—his resistance at the parapet, 206—his charge with six or seven men, 20.—the Russians thrown back some paces, 208—their rally, 20.

men of the Guards now out on the Louvois-way, 46.—line lighting them, 46.—personal emblem, 241.—downward rush of the troops on each flank of the battery, 246.—state of the troops within the work, 246.—outburst of troops from the battery, 247.—flight and pursuit of the Russians in front of the battery, 46.—on up in St Clement's George soon frontal by troops of the 28th Regiment, 46.—Captain Sargent with the Grenadier company, 248—charge by the 105th, 46.—its effect, 46.—true extent of the overthrow sustained by the Russians, 249—a false victory, 46.—westward direction taken by a few, 250—course taken by the bulk, 46.—the high ground almost command, 46.

The nearly approaching battle-line seen by Percy, 250—his measures, &c.—movement effected by the bulk of the soldiery who had fought on the Katspur, 251—Percy's return from the fight, 253—supply of ammunition, 254—reorganisation of the dispersed soldiery, &c.—state of the troops coming in by the Tchernaya bank, 255—the 200 still on high ground, 256—attack made by a party from the heights behind him, 256—the interposed Iakouïsk battalion, &c.—Cathcart, 257—his resolve and stout means, &c.—the attack made by fifty men of the 20th, 258—result of the attack, 259—Cathcart's words to Mailland, 261—Mailland's further efforts, &c.—death of Cathcart, 261—Raymond killed and Mailland wounded, &c.—the remains of the army taken up, &c.

Position of Inkoutsk Battalion on the Fere Ridge, 263—troops on the Duke of Cambridge's left front as well as in his rear, 4.—Burnaby's measures, 264—critical position of the Duke of Cambridge and the colours of the Grenadier Guards, 46.—the interposed force discovered, 265—orders given in consequence, 266—movement of the Inkoutsk battalion, 46—and of the men with the colours of the Grenadier Guards, 46.—the Duke of Cambridge and some of his troops marching past the interposed force, 267—the band of English directly confronted and attacked by the Russians, 46.—Dr Wolseley's charge, 268—the double peril to which the colours are now exposed, 271—Burnaby and his men interpose themselves between the retreating and the pursuing force, 46.—Burnaby's rear-guard action, 46.—constant advances of the French

th of the Line, 277—retreat of the Okhovsk battalions, 278—execution of Burnaby and the other survivors of his little rear-guard, 28.—complete success of Burnaby's rear-guard operations in covering the retreat of the coloures, 279—complete extrication of the 154 English who had been surrounded by the enemy, 280—anxiety suffered by the Duke of Cambridge, 28.—his joy upon witnessing the return of the men with the coloures, 281—continued retreat of the enemy's columns, 282—Russians in the gorge of the Sandbag Battery, 28.—hesitation of the French 6th of the Line, 28.—Captain Armstrong's exertions, 28.—capture of the Sandbag Battery, 283—continued advance of the French 6th of the Line, 28.—meeting between General Bourbaki and Colonel Horrocks, 28.—extremes of the fight in the Klappe, 284—their results, 285.

The centre, 286 — Pennefather's method of defending it, 287 — Major-General's wing of the 20th Regiment, 28 — its protracted resistance to the enemy's attack was due to the 20th men at length pressing back to the crest-work, 288 — continued advance of the Mikontak column, 289 — till attacked and defeated by a wing of Horrocks's Ridge battalions, 28 — Hesse's wing of the 20th thrown forward towards the Barrier, 291 — Bulgarian column coming from and driven back by smoke of Turner's guns, 292 — a Bulgarian column on the crest of the Horse Ridge, 293 — but it is charged and driven back by the men of the 20th, 294 — wantonness of the English forces in front of their centre, 295 — the mist, 296 — General Pennefather 296 — the Gap left open, 296 — and not closed by General Lumsden's measure, 297 — situation created by the stubbornness of the fight at the Barrier, 297 — the enemy made preparations on the left, 298 — charge under Sir Sybil and Ainslie, 299 — the enemy's undertaking to attack the Horse Ridge, 300 — to be met by 400 fresh troops under General Goldie, 300 — combat fought by Colonel Horn and his wing of the 20th, 301 — combat sustained by Captain Stanley at the head of the 2nd, 302 — one of the 2nd's guns struck against the Horse Ridge, 303 — the result of which was when fire was opened during the Second Period, 304.

Third Period - 3:30 A.M. It is 3:30 a.m.—Strength of the Russians on Mount Inkermann at this time, 300—strength of the Allies, 310—plan of the Russians, 311—July 22nd.

for the attack, 339—the great trunk column, 46.—the flanking troops, 60.—the vanguard, 313—strength of the ~~attack~~<sup>the force</sup> delivered by the enemy, 313—means of resistance to this attack, 60.—Russian army, 200, 201—circumstances distinguishing this attack, 46—the enemy's advance not effectually obstructed by the ~~attack~~<sup>the force</sup> of the flanking troops, 60.—Pennefather assailed on his own ridge, 317—the attack delivered by the enemy's vanguard, 316—attack on Boothby's demi-battery at the western extremity of the Home Ridge, 46.—capture of the demi-battery, 330—limited effect of the capture, 331—numbers of the three English guns, 321—position reached by the 57th and the 69th, 332—circumstances tending to mask the enemy's advance, 333—the 100 men of the 56th surprised and driven back, 46.—attack on the right half of Turner's battery, 335—the fire and the well-formed withdrawal of these guns, 46.—movement of the enemy's vanguard, 46.—hesitation of the French battalion, 326—it retreat, 327—peril resulting from the defeat of the French battalion, 46—the rage of Lord Raglan, 334—the step he took, 46—the share of responsibility which the French army deserved in the course of Lord Raglan's confidence at this crisis, 335
—the reverse slope of the ridge, 331—its result, 46.—Egerton's advance up the reverse slope, 332—advance of 7th French line on Egerton's right rear, 46.—withdrawal of the enemy's vanguard from the crest, 46.—continued advance of the great trunk column, 333—forces that could be collected to meet it, 334—cession of a trunk captain of Bouvines with sixty men, 13—his opportune assistance, 46.—Pennefather's disposition of the Anglo-French force, 46.—strength of the ~~attack~~<sup>the force</sup> delivered by the Anglo-French force on Home Ridge, 337—English soldiery interposed between the great trunk column and the reverse slope of the ridge, 338—success of the great trunk column in its efforts to turn the left wing of the British army to this part of the field, 339—preparations for the combat between the great trunk column and the Anglo-French force on Home Ridge, 340—the combat, 343—Colonel Daubeny's singular charge, 347—its effect upon the terms of the combat, 349—conclusion of the combat, 350—return of the great trunk column, numbers of the

Fourth Period—9.10 A.M. to 10 A.M.—Limits of the advantage obtained by the English in the retreat out of the Line driven back, 366—according to the enemy's programme and aims, 362—its effect, 36—appeal to General Goldie, 366—repulsed by the enemy, 366—ground yielded by the English on the line of the Post-road, 36—Haines' understanding the defence of the Barrier, 364—General Goldie, 366—attack on the Barrier repulsed by General Goldie and Haines, 367—steps taken for obtaining small reinforcements, 368—the succour obtained by General Stuart, 36—marks of time 368—under Pennefather's directions, 369—the 'key picket' brought up, 369—assession of Hornford with a few pieces of 12-lb. and 18-lb. naval ordnance at 370—Haines' 12-lb. gun supported the last stand made of the Barrier, 36—the enemy once more were in the ascendant, 372—execution of Lord Raglan's orders to bring up two 18-pounder guns, 36—these placed in battery by Colonel Collingwood Dickson, 376—the Guards brought up in support, 36—the great relative power of these guns, 36—engagement between these two guns and the batteries on Shell Hill, 379—ascendant obtained by the two 18-pounders, 376 the scope of the damage which wrought, 380—Bonneval's guns in battery on the Fara Ridge, 381—arrival of General Desmet with reinforcements, 38—condition under which Desmoulins would now have to act, 381.

7th Parted—10 A.M. to 11 A.M.—
Bonaparte's original intention to support Lord Raglan, and act in concert with him, 383—the appeal which changed his resolve, &c.—and hurried him into an isolated course of action.

Surprise felt by Bosquet upon entering the field of battle, 380—the scenes presented to his observation, 381—the real dimensions of the fight at the Barrier, 387—general character of the English fore-front, 388—the 'Gap' at 3 p.m.—and impression of the disposition of the 400 Chasseurs, 389—combat maintained by them with the aid of some 'Twentieth' men against two Russian columns, 390—arrival of more French reinforcements, 391—the great power now in Bosquet's hands, 392—despair of the two fresh battalions, 393—Bosquet's advance to the Inkermann Tusk, 394—the array when there, 395—advance of a Russian column on Bosquet's left, 396—peril and escape of Bosquet, 397—disengagement of the French, 398—the losses wrought in Desnichenko's batteries, 399—their removal from the Rose Ridge, 400—the Russians blind to their opportunity, and absent in force, 401—a moment of the heat of danger, 402—his cavalry brought up, 403—his retreat, 404—despair of the French, 405—their considerate intimation to Dickson, 406—the present effect of the reverse sustained by the French, 407—the Allies in jeopardy, 408—the enemy's inaction, 409—losses, 410—distrust from the continued success of the English, 411—returning hopefulness of the French troops, 412—Bosquet's measures, 413—the wing of the 16th in the Cemetery Ridge, 414—arrangement of the Hesse installation, 415—appearance of some Coldstream men, 416—signal defeat of the Belogorsk battalions by Zouavized Algerian troops, 417—operations of the 7th Lancers and 4th of the Line at the Barrier at 10 P.M.—held fast, 418—11 A.M., close of the combat undertaken by French infantry, 419.

Sixth Period—11 A.M. to 1 P.M.—Strength and disposition of the French and English infantry, 411—the apparently great power and appearance of the French army, 412—Lord Raglan and Gourebert, 413—Pomelotter's message to Lord Raglan, 414—his interview with Lord Raglan and Gourebert, 414—Gourebert's continued inaction, 415—his definitive abandonment of the offensive, 416—the import of this resolve, 417—his own 'I see' was not preposterous, 418—Desnichenko's absence at this time, 419—Gourebert's course of action in accordance with Desnichenko's wishes, 421—non-cooperation of the English in Gourebert's plan of abandoning the offensive, 422—not thrown to St George's Barr, 423—the enemy's hold now only challenged by 300 English and the 18-pounders, 424—state of the field to a large part of the ground now occupied by the Allies, 425—the way to which the Allies were gradually drawn on to take the offensive, 426—Marceau's rout and capture of the Barrier, 427—skirmishing on the left front of the Barrier, 428—transition from the heat of action to that of attack, 429—inactivity of the Russians, despite their shattered state, 430—ambition of Jaiden in the direction of his left front, 431—Lord West, 432—his order to retire, 433—the combat undertaken by Acton, 434—retreat of the garrison battery, 435—the guns forwarded by Desnichenko, 436—attack over gained during part of the Shell Hill position, 437—the other half of which was vacated to prevent, 438—1 o'clock—on Inkermann's orders to begin the retreat, 439—the beginning of the retreat described by Codrington, 440.

Seventh Period—1 P.M. to 3 P.M.—Advance of the infantry directed to cover the retreat, 447—it discomfiture, 448—the Russians in peril of being overtaken by a great disaster, 449—refusal of Gourebert to take any part in preventing the retreat, 450—no pursuit undertaken by the Allies, 451—Prince Menschikoff's attempt to countermand the retreat, 452—his altercation with Desnichenko, 453—Menschikoff deliberately sent or sought by Desnichenko, 454—Desnichenko's refusal of countering the retreat, 455—operation of withdrawing the Russian artillery from Mount Inkermann, 456—circumstances favouring the task, 457—the two last Russians to leave on that hill, 458—Lord Raglan's way of accelerating their withdrawal, 459—the last gun withdrawn from Shell Hill, 460—3 o'clock, the topside of Mount Inkermann now clear of Russian forces, 461—fire from the two Russian batteries, 462—a retreat of French infantry supported by two battalions, 463—result of this movement, 464—General Gourebert and Lord Raglan on the heights vacated by the enemy, 465—retreat of the artillery brought up from Sebastopol, 466—Colonel Wedderburn's corps, 467—a frustration by General de Tedeben, 468—6 o'clock, the enemy's retreat accomplished, and the Inkermann fight at an end, 469—losses sustained in the fight on Mount Inkerman, th.—by the Russians, th.—by the English, 481—by the French, 486—order of the fight, th. First Period, 4.45 a.m. to 7.30 a.m. th. Second Period, 7.30 a.m. to 8.30 a.m., 487 Third Period, 8.30 a.m. to 9.15 a.m., 488—Fourth Period, 9.15 a.m. to 10 a.m., 489—Fifth Period, 10 a.m. to 11 a.m., 491—Sixth Period, 11 a.m. to 1 p.m., 493—Seventh Period, 1 p.m. to 5 p.m., 498.

Cost of the General Engagement—How the enemy's failure on Mount Inkerman part and his retreat elsewhere, and situation of the garrisons along the main part of their front, &c.—the loss of Prince Gorchakov, 6.15 a.m. to 8.30 a.m. fresh troops, 488—his losses, 98—losses of the French forces fighting the Pegnitz Battalion, 488—the battering of the main fight on the general engagement, th.—and of the garrisons anywhere on the main fight, th.—losses resulting from the general engagement, 488.

RUSSIAN NARRATIVE. Request to the, vi. 487—rejection of the proposal that Russians should come out to bury the dead, th.—charge against the Russian soldiery of having butchered the wounded in the battle, 488—the motives which caused the retreat, 488—the 6 p.m. fire maintained by Russians when lying wounded, note, 472 a.m. to 9.15 a.m. C. M. R. M. R. A. th.—were the English surprised at Inkerman? 472 efforts made to account for the defeat of the Russians, 478—what if Belosov had succeeded by the Victoria Ridge? 477—real extent of the advantage possessed by the Allies in point of arms, 483—causes most strongly tending to account for the defeat of the Russians in combat with our troops, 483—the ground, th. the way to the enemy's great way of fighting, 487—quality of the English officers and men, 489—magnitude of the results that might have followed a Russian victory at Inkerman, th.—how the Allies advanced overusing their victory as a means to a greater end, th.—and even allowed themselves to be shocked by the battle, 491—size of the enemy's objects attained, th.—impressive proof of the 8th Regt. of the enemy's exhibition of numerical strength, 493—caused offered by General Rynev, th. Lord Raglan's appreciation of the evolution under which he must act, 493.

Inkerman, iv. 72, 220, 226 note.

Inkerman battle-field, vi. 481; ix. 87. Inkerman Bridge, iv. 41 a.m., 49; vi.

52, 72 a.m., 116, 488—description of, viii. 40, 262.

"Inkerman heights," the, iv. 72 note, 226 note; vi. 46 note—the defense of, vi. 182.

Inkermann, losses resulting from the general engagement at, vi. 488.

Inkermann march, vi. 447.

Inkermann Mount, iv. 150, 224; vi. 44—its shape, 45—the brushwood clothed hill—a sharp turn—a road to Inkerman, 44 a.m.—the southern part of, including the English Heights, might have offered a good defensive position to a whole army corps, but could be secured by Pennefather, 40—new Russian works on, viii. 44 a.m.

Inkermann ridge, the, vi. 14.

Inkermann ruins, iv. 220 note; vi. 22.

Inkermann spur, vi. 14.

Inkerman, the losses of, 487.

Inkermann Tush, the, vi. 70, 82, 161, 162, 164, 167, 168, 169 a.m.; vi. 44 a.m.

Inkermann village, the, vi. 187 a.m.

Inking, 22 a.m., vi. 22.

Inkermann Bay at battle of Balaclava, viii. 40.

Imhoff, C. Colonel, vi. 307.

Imhoff, Admiral, vi. 84, 104, 173, 200, 212, 222; vi. 420—death of, vi. 111.

Johannitsky, General, iv. 180 a.m.; v. 44 a.m. to 9.15 a.m., 74, 75—infantry and artillery, position of, 180, 184, 186, 187, 188, 189, 207, vi. 44.

Jones, General, vi. 315.

Jugendil, the, vi. 317.

Jeffreys, Colonel, vi. 17 note, 161, 164.

Jenyns, Captain, v. 200, 202, 203, 206 note.

Jerome Bonaparte, i. 224, 225—natural history of his son, 227.

Jerome Prince, ii. 25 a.m.

Jemapline, General, v. 44 note, 17 note, 18, 19 a.m.—his losses later in rear of the 8th Hussars, 207—his dismounted horses, 202, 214, 217—his horses, 218 note, 207.

Jervis, Lieut. Edward Lomax, v. 200.

Jervis, Colonel, major, vi. 206 note; iv. 19.

Jesse, Captain, iv. 181 and note.

Jesse, Captain's statement regarding the conflict in the streets of Paris, i. 272 to vi. 19 a.m.

Jessop, Colonel, vi. 418.

Johnson, Lieutenant, vi. 200.

John, Lt. Lieutenant Bentworth, v. 200, 201.

Jones, M. 718.

Jones, Captain, iv. 207.

Jones, Major, vi. 21 note.

Jones, General Sir Harry, vii. 204—at Council of 6th March, viii. 76—com-member of military engineers, 111; p. 184 note, 197.

Jordan, Captain, viii, 118 note.

Jordan, Lieutenant, at night attack on Woronzoff Ridge, viii, 97, 98, 100.

Journal sui, triumphs of European, vii, 449 note.

Journalist, English, the tasks of, vi, 219.

Justice, Lord Chief, on Lord Cardigan's conduct, v, 257 note, 264 note.

Jules, the, vi, 400, 417.

Kabyle country, the, ix, 29.

Kadikof, the village of, ix, 14 of sq., 190—the gorge of, v, 20 of sq., the York Light Dragoon, 45, 70 of sq., "1" 24 of sq., 78, 84, 89, 94, 147 note, 164, 165 of sq., vi, 7, 19, 26, 444 note; vi, 400, and et seq.

Kaff, ii, 212, 213.

Kainardji, the treaty of, i, 111, 200.

Kalafat, ii, 49, 41, 217.

Kalamita Bay, i, 327, 335; iv, 61.

Kamara, the village of, v, 84, 85—the defences of, 81 of sq., vi, 61, 72, 226, vii, 20, 41.

Kaniesch, iv, 219—The French drew their supplies from, 220; vii, 45, 50, 60, 640; ix, 24, 27.

Kantoch, bay of, iv, 81 of sq., 200; v, 200.

Kantoch, depot at, endangered by Emperor's plan, viii, 284.

Kashish Boroune, landing-places of, viii, 20, 21, 41, 42.

Kasatche, the Lake of, ii, 202, 203—battle of, 203.

Kazbekha Lancers formation of viii, 20, 21, 24, 25, 26, 27, iii—the, 104, 105; ii, 20, 24 of sq., 106 of sq., 109, 110.

Karabelnaya, the, or Karabelsbourg, iv, 10, 45, 50 of sq., 127 of sq., 151, 174, 182, 191, 200, 314, 322, 325 of sq., 420, 421, 425, 442; v, 359, 372; vi, 21, 22, 23—the garrison of the, 54, 55, 73—the batteries of the, 76, 96, 448, 450—effect of April bombardment on, viii, 139, ix, 11, 24, 29, 94 of sq., 100, 101 of sq., 134 of sq., 208 of sq., 215, 241 of sq., 261, 264, 270, 291 note.

KARABEHNAYA, ATTACK OF THE COUNTER-APPROACHES ix, 50—rescue of Pelissier and Lord Raglan to attack the counter-approaches in the Karabelnaya, vii—the co-operation of the English and French commanders, vii—the shield thus afforded against Lord Raglan's vii—the vain resistance of Pelissier to the front English counter-approaches, vii—rescue of Pelissier vii—the counter-attack on Pelissier and the destruction of the garrison, vii—the assault in Tschelben, vii—his conqueror, vii.

Opening of the Third Bombardment,

ix, June, 60—Tschelben warmly greeted by the English troops, 61—signatures of their cheer, vii—the bombardment at night, 67—bombardment of the 7th of June, vii—effect of the bombardment, vii—the force of the English guns, 68—crippled state of the enemy's works concerned in opposing the French, vii—the less injured state of them in opposing the English, 69—the time for the bombardment, vii.

Plan and preparations for the assault, 59—attack and seizure of the two White Redoubts, 100—seizure and abandonment of the Malakoff battery, 101—the Russians throwing forward two battalions of their Morozov Regiment, vii—movement of Colonel d'Orion under Bosquet's orders, 102—his overthrow of the two Morozov battalions, vii—400 Russians surrendering, vii—French soldiery far out in front, 103—fruitless advances of Russian troops, vii—their reported achievements, vii.

The French troops preparing to assault the Kasteketsa Lunette, and impeded by Bosquet, 106—their advance in a state of warlike observation, 107—the Vivandiere, vii—their seizure of the Lunette, 108, 110—the impetuous advance on the Malakoff, 110—they retreat were overtaken to strength by General Khroustaloff, vii—Khroustaloff's recapture of the Kasteketsa Lunette, 111—General Bosquet's measures, 112—second and definitive capture of the Lunette by the French, vii—the Malakoff in imminent danger, vii.

The 'Quarries,' 113—the enemy's measures of defence, 114—Lord Raglan's disposition for the attack, 115—the task of our storming parties under Colonel R. Campbell on one flank, and Major James Armstrong on the other, 116—the seizure of the Work, vii—capture of the collateral entrenchments, 117—flight of the defenders, pursued by our troops, 118—our men in the extreme front, vii.

The tasks yet awaiting our people, 118—Major Armstrong, vii—Colonel Campbell's command, 119—Colonel Grant's meeting with Colonel Tyldes, vii—the great strain put on the powers of those who remained, 120—Colonel Tyldes, Thornton Grant, and Elphinstone, vii—Captain, now General Viscount Wolseley, G.C.B., 121—contests maintained by infantry between two opposite batteries, 122—Bridgeman's attack, vii—the English driving the Russians back into their fortresses, 123—attack made by the Polyakoff Regiment, 6.—its progress, 16.—and final discomfiture, 16.—conditions under which our troops fought, 124—Colonel Shirley, 16.

Another Russian column advancing to attempt the re-capture, 194—present condition of our men, 126—show of resistance attempted by some officers and men, 16.—its effect, 126—the Russian column faltering and coming to a stop, 16.—and falling back, 16.—the English at break of day still retaining their hold, 16.

The three Fortune had in bringing about this result, 126—execution meanwhile of the needed works, 117—arrow + penetration from the guns of silence after the victory, 128—Colonel Campbell, Captain Wolseley, 16—killed, wounded, and missing, 19—spoils, 16.—the Allies on their advanced front, 16.—charge experienced by the parties and allies, 16.—continuation of the third bombardment, 120— the losses it caused, 16.

Kortachinsky Battery, the, IV. 164 note.

*Karsavinsky's 'Telegraph' Bulletin, IV. 16.

Kazan, the valley of the, II. 285, 312, 318; III. 304, 316 et seq.—advance on the, 16.—the range on the banks, 16.—the allied army moving on the, 16; cf seq., 206 note; IV. 2, 6, 22 et seq., 66, 70 et seq., 100, 101 note, 213, 242, 250.

Katchinsky, Captain, IV. 426.

Kazan column, defeat of the, III. 316.

Kazatch, bay of, IV. 31 et seq., 218; V. 296.

Kazatch the port of, IV. 30—Lord Raglan's body conveyed to, IV. 304— the road to, lined on each side by double ranks of infantry, 302.

Keith, Lord, VII. 421 note.

Keller, M., VII. 434 note.

Kerch. Crosses, 1; noon night attack on Weronskoff Bridge, VIII. 92, 13, 36, 56, 57—wounded and taken prisoner, 56 and note.

Kennedy, Mr., IX. 102.

Kerlengot, a 251.

Ker, Captain, VI. 37 note, 48 note, 61 note.

Kerch, the resulted expedition to, and effect of the recall, VIII. chap. X.

Kerch, THE ALLIED EXPEDITION TO, WITH THE SKETCH OF THE SEA OF AZOF, AND ON THE CIRCASSIAN COAST, THE PRELIMINARY OUTLINE OF THE PART OF VIII. chap. X, and in particular, pp. 256 to 262—happy effect produced by the enemy's mere sight of the star observed in the port of Kerch, IX. 29—composition of the armada, 40—its course, 41—the strength of Baron Wrangel, 9.—his retreat, 41—unopposed landing of troops, 16.—Sir George Brown's measures on shore, 44—Baron Wrangel's destruction of his coast batteries, 45.—retreat of Russian troops, 46.—destruction of food by Baron Wrangel, 46—the squadron of, 9.—McGillivray's exploits, 46—the fate of the squadron, 47—disembarking operations of the Allies, 16.—channel into the sea of Azof found and buoyed, 16.—Miranda reaching the entrance of the Sea of Azof 48—advance of the land forces through Kerch, 16.—to Teal Kala, 16.—orders that followed the invasion, 16.—the limited authority of Sir George Brown, 49—prayer of the people of Kerch to Sir George, 16.—his rejection of their entreaty, 16.—disorders on the march and in Teal Kala, 51—suspicion of all misconduct of the English troops, 16.—measures taken by Sir George Brown for the maintenance of discipline, 16.—their reception by the Tartars in Kerch destroying and plundering, 16.—the measures taken by Brown and the people of Kerch, 16.—failure of the measures taken, 16—outbreak and disorders in, 16.—the extreme state of outrage, 16.—further consequences of outrages in, 16.—Lord Raglan's indignation, 16.—his approval of 5 of May of Brown's measure, 16.—the Allies did not consent to his marching to recover the prisoners of the French, 16.—friendly disposition of the Tartars, 17.—Barbary pirates based on the sea and wounded 16 caused by the pillaging of the hospitals, 16.—set off on their return from Baron Wrangel, 16.—first results of the expedition, 50.—the main object gained, 51.—the Allied admirals entering the sea of Azof, 16.

Captain Lyons (Wheat) takes the command of the united flotilla, 52—nature of the operations undertaken in the sea of Azof, 16.—fate of the four surviving war-ships of the Kerch squadron, 16.—unchallenged mastery of the Allies in the hitherto closed sea, 43—access thus obtained to the interior provinces of Russia, 16.—the seat of industry that Lyons disturbed, 44—his task not over bearing in, 44 to 46—his task not yet complete, 46 to 51 and 56—those that had fled towards land, 46.—operation of the Spit of Berdiansk, 46.—the wrecks of the four war-steamer that had escaped from Kerch, 16.—off the town of Berdiansk, 46.—Lyons engaging the part of

Ardal, 9.—plan of summoning the authorities, 10.—the rejections 10—elected, 10.—these compared w. in the acts of the authorities professing defiance, 11—operations at Genchala, 11—operations at Taganrog and the mouth of the Don, 12.—the good seamanship manifested by the French and the English, 14—operations at 15.—spot Gheisk, and on the shore of Kitch Bay, 15, 16—losses of the Russians, 16—of the Allies, 16—causes of their immunity, 16—greatness of the havoc, 17—many of the vessels destroyed Greek, 18—the moral stress put on Russia by taking the Sea of Azof, 18.

Attack on Soudjak-Kale and Anapa recommended, 20—troops despatched for the purpose, 20.—fall of Soudjak-Kale, 21—attack of Anapa peremptorily forbidden by Louis Napoleon, 21.—Pelissier's determined resistance to the prohibition, 22—Lord Raglan on the French Emperor, 22.—Anapa, 23.—the enemy's forced abandonment of the whole Circassian coast, 24.—troops left to guard the Straits, 24.—the rest brought back, 24.

General results of the Kertch Expedition, 24.—it was not caused by surprise, 24.—the true cause was a want of power to withstand the two invasions, 25.—Liont the originator and eager advocate of the Expedition, 26.—his zeal shared by Admiral Bruat, 26.—he was a warm, never-failing support, 26.—still Pelissier, by his propagation of the measure against the will of the Emperor, became the conqueror of the greatest obstacle, 27.

Effect of the success on Louis Napoleon, 28.—in the camps of the Allies, 28.—on the Russians, 28.—the stress it put on their war, 28.

Kertch, Straits of, viii. 24—endeavours to guard, 255—the town of, iv. 90, viii. 255, 256—the Peninsula of, 254.

Kertchins Peninsula, the, viii. 254 et seq.; ix. 40, 42, 44, 50, 54, 56, 58, 60, 262 et seq.

Kessler, i. 264.

Key and star, the delivery of the, to the Latin monks, i. 241 note.

Khanstor Pass, iv. 33.

Khomotoff, General, iii. 260 note; iv. 37, 89, 149; ix. 21, 24, 25.

Khomenko, ix. 123.

Khroustoff, General attacks Esparatoria, viii. 43—his defeat, 44—leads sortie against the French, counts repulse, 45; ix. 17, 22, 26, 108 et seq., 111, 114, 120, 200.

Khroustchoff, General, viii. 47 et seq.

Kidd, Lieut., ix. 189.

Kirbride, William, vi. 269.

King Battery, the, viii. 29 and note, 26, 262.

King, Captain, viii. 216 note.

King, Comet William Attack, v. 226.

King, William, vi. 249.

Kingsgate, Colonial Night, vi. 202; viii. 182, 465.

Kinshay, M. 186.

Kintlech, Captain, vi. 210.

Kissoff, General vii. 11 note 11, 13, 16 note, 43, 45, 46, 50, 57, 178, 185, 190, 199 and note 198 note, 19 note, 230, 233, 239, 292 et seq., 295 note, 296, 302, 309, 315 et seq.—his stand after the battle of the Alma, 257; iv. 41 et seq., 168.

Kitei Bay, operations on the shore of, ix. 76.

Kitapur, the, vi. 21 et seq., 48, 114, 180, 192, 194, 196, 198 et seq., 200, 204, 206, 208 et seq.—reinforcements brought to the Kitapur, 114, 115, 214, 220, 226, 227, &c. vii. 194, 204, 206 et seq.—conquest of the Kitapur on the, 204—their results, 206, 208, 210, 202 note et seq., 211 et seq., 206 et seq.

Knollys, Lieut.-General, vi. 472 note.

'Kokana', the, v. 26 note.

Kolivansk Battalion, the, vi. 21, 22 et seq., 111.

Kooikhoff Field, iv. 31.

Korniloff, Vice-Admiral of the Russian Navy, i. 100, 11, 242 note, 250, 10, 20, 20 et seq.—his ride to the Alma before 4 o'clock, 27— instructed by Menschikoff to close the entrance to the harbour of Sebastopol, 26, 76, 79 et seq., 10, 102—returning to Menschikoff's plan, 20 et seq., 21, 26 note—commander of the forces on the north side of Sebastopol, 102, 104, 116, 117, 118, 122, 126—he moves to the south side with a strong force, 124—he is invested with the supreme command, 126, 128—he joins with Tschetvertchenko, 126, 127, 128, 129—he joins with Tolleben in ordering the fleet to be concentrated and saving its resources to the defence of Sebastopol, 127, 142, 246, 248, 250, 252, 254, 255 and note 170, 174, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212 et seq.—his conversation with Menschikoff, 202, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228— the wound he received there, 229—his death, 231—the heroic quality of his nature, 26, 282, 283, 284, viii. 44, 45, 220, 221, 222.

Korn, L. 204.

Kostmaroff Battery, the, injuries to, viii. 194.

Kostrukov, Colonel, ix. 75, 86.

Kotchubei, General, iv. 51 note.

Koumari, the fortress of, ix. 83, 84.

Koudriavsev, Ensign, vi. 38.

Koullali, hospital at, vii. 181. See Stanley, Miss.

Kourgan Hill, the, ii. 3 and note, 9, 12, 14, 15 et seq., vi. 82, 97, 98 et seq., 143—warlike display of the Russians on the, 145, 159, 164, 169, 208, 213—the attack on, 224 235, 244 note, 256, 274, 275 et seq., 276 of seq., 317, iv. 97.

Kralevsky, Colonel, ix. 103 et seq.

Krasnoff, General, ix. 72, 85.

'Kriegsberichterstattung,' the conduct of, as regards Prussia, viii. 818.

Krossikoff, vi. 152 note.

Kriidose, Baron, iv. 318.

Kriidose, Colonel, v. 49.

Kulik, the hospital at, vii. 208, 209.

Kwiatkowski, General, iii. 18, 41, 51, 147, 151, 157, 159, 161 et seq., 164, 243, 244 note—his defeat, 235—and retreat, 254—in wounded and disabled, 246, 248 note, 250.

Kynaston, Commander, iv. 289, 294 note.

Laboratory Service, the, viii. 167 note.

Lagendie, Colonel, ii. 384.

'La Hale Santa,' ix. 299.

Lang, Dr Sidney, vi. 484.

Lairneq Battery, the, vi. 646 note.

Lake, Colonel, vi. 170 note.

Lake, Lieut.-Colonel, ii. 262.

Lambert, Commander, iii. 46.

Lamprocicke, General, i. 264.

Lancaster Battery, the vi. 24, 448, 473 note; ix. 106, 157, 159, 260.

Land Quarantine Battalion, .v. 54 et seq., 144, 207 et seq., 213 et seq.—partially destroyed, 314.

Lansbury, Sergeant, ix. 192.

Land service, the, strength of England in 1809, not including her Indian establishments, vii. 416.

Land-transport corps, formation of a, vii. 237.

Landfrey, Mr., referred to, vii. 417.

Lansdowne, Lord, vii. 232.

Larchey, General, on dangers of electric communication, viii. 264, 277.

Lawrence C. I. and J. S. 26 note, 77, 84, 85 note, 86, 100 note, 108, 114 note, 115, 125, iv. 8, 16 vi. 68 note.

Lavallée, M. de, i. 48, 55, 136, 341.

Leverand, General, Brigade, ix. 104 et seq.—his death, 106.

Lawsonius, General, i. 244 et seq.

Layard, Mr., v. 238 note.

Layland, Thomas, vi. 246.

Lazaroff, Admiral, iv. 49.

League, the, for the defence of the Balkans, i. 388.

Leaven bred for soldiers, vi. 400 note.

Le Bris, Captain, at March Expedition, viii. 274.

Ledgeway, the, vi. 243, 245, 265 et seq.

Leibö, General, i. 254.

Leiningen, Count, mission to the Porte, i. 76—visit of W.; ii. 188.

Leiningen, Prince, ii. 214.

Le Jeune, i. 288.

Le Jeune, Captain, ix. 73.

Lemprière, Captain, death of, viii. 212, 215 note.

Lemprière, Lieutenant, vi. 141.

Leslie, G. J. D. A. M. vi. 167, iv. 424.

Letter of Service, quaint expedient of, vii. 20.

Letters of Service, vii. 41, 74, 17.

Leytenant's division, vi. 38.

Lewant, engineer officers sent to the, ii. 64—car hospitals in the, vii. 167.

Lewotsky, General, advance of his forces, v. 64, 66.

Lewis, Lieutenant, vi. 164.

Lewin, Sir George, vii. 471.

Lidwell, Lieut., iii. 146 note; vi. 46 note, 62 note.

Liven, Madame, on new Czar's policy, viii. 39.

Light Brigade, the charge of the, v. 166 et seq.—the wild mistake of the, ix. 261.

Lighthouse, the guns near the, vi. 75.

Likhstetoff, Admiral, iv. 73 note, 146 note, 210 note.

Lime-juice ordered by Dr Andrew Smith, vii. 123.

Liberation of Black Sea Fleet, question of, at Vienna Conference, viii. 839 et seq. 854.

Lindsay, Captain Robert, vi. 241.

Linton, Colonel Claring, vi. 240.

Liprandi's command of the detachment of Tchongour, iv. 452 v. 34, 44 et seq., 51, 71, 73, 78, 79, 82 101 note, 109, 113, 194, 195, 226 note, 235 et seq., 264, 267 note, 268—battalions on the Caucasic Heights, 297—his guess-work regarding the exploit of the Light Brigade, 314, 339—the Allies acquiesce in his capture of the Turkish redoubts, 343, 346, 349, 353—results of his enterprise, 367 et seq., 368, 384; vi. 18, 20, vii. 8, 106, 264.

Lisicki, Lord, iii. 419.

Lloyd, General, vi. 261.

Lloyd, Lieutenant, iv. 274 note.

Loering, Captain, iv. 63.

Lobanoff-Rostofsky, Colonel Prince, ii. 67, 79, 85.

Loch, Mr George, II. 269 note, 348; iv. 171 note.

Lockwood, Captain, v. 217 note, 227—the supposed fate of, 228, 229.

Lockyer, General, viii. 216 note.

Loco, 1804, Russian, oppressive nature of, viii. 18.

London, the defense of, vii. 411 note.
Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, Prince, President of the French Republic, and the origin of one of the causes of the Crimean War, 1853, vol. i. chap. xiv.—immediate effect of the coup d'état upon the transaction of foreign affairs, the just of which it necessitated, 48.—the French Government coerced the Sultan into measures offensive to Russia, and then sought an alliance with England, 241—personal feelings of the new Emperor, 242—the French Emperor's scheme for superseding the concert of the four Powers, 243—the nature of the understanding of mid-November 1853 between France and England, 243; his ambiguous scheme of action, 244; his extremely pusillanimous diplomacy, 251—he engages England in naval movements tending to provoke war, 252—he does nothing to thwart the success of the Vienna Note, 271—his means of putting a pressure upon the English Cabinet, 2, 3—his violent urgency for an advance of the fleets to Constantinople, 7—his prepossession, 20—his ambiguous character, 21—his personal traits, 21—his conduct to the Emperor of Austria, 24—his letter to the Czar, 26—England's engagements with, 26—his relations with Lord Palmerston, 108—message from, to the Chambers, 136—effect of personal government by, 136.

He greets Lord Raglan in Paris, ii. 170—he is to be the agent of a plot against, 180—surveillance by, 222 of seq.—his charge of timid counsels, 218—his interference in the conduct of the war, vi. chap. v., vi., viii., ix., x., xi., and xii. chap. i., ii., iii.

Looch, Mr., capo, vi. 8; fr. 41, 42 of seq., 73 of seq.

Lourmel, General, iv. 281.

Lourmel's brigade, iii. 194, 201.

Lourmel, the, iii. 339.

Loyell, Captain, R.M., ii. 213.

Low, Major, v. 307.

Low, Captain Alexander, v. 202.

Lowney, Lieutenant, fr. 12.

Lounsh, Lord, ii. 279 of seq.; iii. 206, 279, 280—takes possession of Dvinsk, iii. 201; iv. 5 of seq., 14, 26, 280—he commands of the cavalry division, v. 2—his want of experience in the field, v. 3, 4, 5, 7, 10, 15, 18—Lord Cardigan's abhorrence of antagonism to, 19—at battle of Balaclava, 48 of seq., 46, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55 note, 72, 87, 90, 94 note, 95, 96, 97—his suppression of Scarlett's despatch recommending him for promotion, 124 as general-in-chief orders and instructions, 142 and note, 162 note, vi. 20 note, 163, 79—he and Lord Cardigan mistook his orders, 174, 175, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191 note, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200—his orders to Lord Raglan, vi. 91 & 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101 note, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 299 note, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321 note, 322, 323 and note at seq., 324—recommendations by, 276, 280 of seq.; iv. 26, 27, 28—his recommendation on assault of Sebastopol, 179—his renewed counsels, 178 of seq., 180 note, 224, 280 note, 281, 282 of seq., 270 note—approves of naval attack on the seaports, 209, 210—on the topic, after a note, 204, 205 of seq.—on board his flag-ship Agamemnon attacking Port Craudon, Dec. 1854, 274 of seq.—has a memorandum for General commanding, vi. 20—on effect of his measures, viii. 200 of seq., 201, 202, 203, 204, 205—his responsibility for the attack on the stone fort, 418 and note, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424 of seq. note; viii. 205; viii. 48, 49—invited to attend conference, 78—commands expedition against Kertch, 201, 202, 203, 204—turns back, 274; ix. 20—in command of the renewed Kertch Expedition, vii.—his recommendation to General General of Staff, vii.—as chief engineer of the Kertch Expedition, vii.—in favour of the Lermontov, 202—on the plan of Lord Raglan's death, 203.

Lyons, Sir Edmund, Admiral, extract from a memorandum of a conversation held with, which was made by Mr. George Leath, Feb. 10, 1866, vi. 202.

Lyons, Captain, fr. 40—takes the command of the united flotilla in the Bay of Acre, 42, 44, 45—he engages the fort of Arslat, 45 of seq., 46, 47 of seq.—Loyalty, Oct. 1854, ii. 20 note, 201 and note; iii. 20 note, 21 note; vi. 402.

McGough, Captain, v. 202.

Macdonald, Sir, 200 ; vi. 200.
 Macdonald, Captain, A. H. vi. 20.
 Macdonald, Captain, vi. 144.
 Macdonald, Lieutenant, adjutant of the 65th, at Inkermann, vi. 147, 314 note.
 Macdonald, Major James, vi. 200, 207 and 207a.
 Macdonald, Mr., and the 'Times' Fund,
   vii. 474, 475, 480.
 MacIntyre, Dr., v. 144.
 MacNab, Major, vi. 20 : vi. 20 note.
 MacNab, Lieutenant, adjt. of the 44th.
 MacNeath, John, vi. 201 and note.
 MacGregor, Sir James, vii. 204.
 MacGregor, Dr., vii. 274.
 McIntosh, Donald, vi. 210.
 Mackenzie, Brigadier Major, vi. 20, 20, 21
   note.
 Mackenzie's Force, iii. 104, 120 ; iv. 8 et seq.—Rango, M. 200—Lord Raglan moves towards, iv. 13—used as a temporary barracks, 10, 41, 100, 101,
   v. 48 ; vi. 20 note : vii. 26, 220.
 Mackintosh Heights, the, iii. 200, 400
   iv. 20, 22 et seq., 120, 163, 222 et seq.,
   v. 48, 74, vi. 45 and 200 note—proposed storming of, viii. 204, 205, 201,
   213, v. 20, 200.
 Mackenzie, Lieutenant, ix. 20, 20.
 Mackenzie, Major, vii. 400, 407.
 Mackenzie Range, Montenikoff opening the, iv. 142.
 Mackie, Sir Southey, vi. 120.
 MacLaren, Lieutenant, ix. 20.
 MacMahon, General, M. 200 note—his conduct of the land defences of Sebastopol, vii. 279 and note, 300—on Balaklava, iv. 21 note.
 MacKellar, Major, v. 48, 200.
 MacLennan, C. and, appointed to organise a land-transport service, vii. 204, 207—his arduous labours, vii. 204.
 MacMahon, Marshal, vii. 400.
 MacNeill, Sir John, and Colonel Talbot, on the road question, vi. 400 note.
 MacNab, Sir John, vii. 200, 300, 300, 300.
 MacKenzie, Mr. vi. 200.
 Magrath, General, I. 200—his part in the 61st and 91st, 207, 200, 200.
 Mahatma Gurus, v. 207 note.
 Maitland, Major, vi. 200—his daring
   exploit, 202.
 Many which contained dead in hospital, note respecting the description of, vi. 148.
 Malakoff Hill, the, iv. 20 note.
 Malakoff, the knowledge regarding the,
   M. 200 ; iv. 146—Korniloff on his weakness, 153, 173—the approach to the, 200, 207, 200, 313—gun on dismounted 200. Korniloff's visit to the, vi. 479 and ; vi. 75. Derry's bulletins upon garrisoning, viii. 20.

vii. 200, 200—shelling groups of, 12, 200
   —French war against, 23—disposition of troops, 20—works against, 20—frustration of designs regarding, 137 resistance of French to attack, 130
   —new obstacle to siege of, 20, 21 ;
   ix. 20, 24—impetuous advance of the French on the, 110, 112, 113, 124, 121, 127—the French operations against,
   127—the bombardment of, 120, 201,
   212 et seq.—the still distant, 276, 200
 Malakoff Tower the, iv. 21 no. 4, 20, 127 et seq., 203 et seq., 204, 279 ; vi.
   21 viii. 127, 128.
 Malakoff Work the, vi. 200 et seq.
 Mancini, Lieutenant, vi. 20 note.
 Mandeville, Edward, vi. 200.
 Mansfield, East, v. 1. 20 note.
 Malta, English troops sent to, vi. 20.
 Malta, G. 200 ; vi. 20.
 Mansfield, proposed French attack of viii. 2, 10, 12, 19, 20, 120, 202—One obstacle to success for desiring to seize the, vi. 20—recommendation to occupation of, vi. 12, 104, 120, 204.
 Mansfield Heights, ix. 20.
 Mansfield, the Green, vi. 20.
 Manchester School, vi. 1. 200.
 Mantley, Captain, v. 117.
 Mantley, Major, v. 117, 200 et seq.
 Mansfield Harbour, i. 1. 20, 170, 200,
   200 et seq., 207, 204, 206, 206, 207
 Mantua, Duke, M. 20, 14, 20.
 March from the Alma to the Danube, 200—Councils of the Allies versus Prevailing: disposition and state of the Allied armies after the battle of the Alma, vi. 200—state of the field after the battle, 205—fate of the wounded Russians, 205—expediency of a prompt advance after the victory won by the Allies, 207—the halt on the Alma, 200—abandonment of the resolve to attack the North
   Fort, vi. 207—Lord Raglan and Sir
   H. Lyons of opinion it should not be attacked, 208—the first of the 'lost occasions,' 209—advance to the Karako, 200—Lord Raglan's cavalry at the Belbek, 200—the cause of the hesitation at the French Headquarters, 204—the advance of the
   A. as delayed at the instant of Al
   Arroud & the advance resumed, 204—hesitated to start, 20—state of the ruined condition of the Russian army, 207—the invaders descend into the valley of the Belbek, 200—reconnaissance by Lord Cardigan, vi.
   —the resolve to abandon the old plan of the invasion, vi.—the design of operating against the defences of,
   from the north, 200—strength of the resources for attacking the North Fort, 20—the time had now come for a final decision, 201—the Star Fort and its defences, 242 et seq.—the forces available for the defence, 243—policy of attacking the North Fort, 243—the objections against attacking the North Side, 371—the grounds of Sir John Burgoyne's conclusion, 374—the objections to attack in the French Headquarters, 375—reconnaissances by Sir E. Lyons, 376—failure of the endeavour to persuade St Armand to resume the plan of attacking the Star Fort, &c.—Lord Raglan well qualified to lessen the evil of a divided command, 377—the dilemma of the Allies, 378—the available information regarding the land defences of Sebastopol, 38—information supplied by Colonel Macintosh and Mr Lawrence Oliphant, 379 et seq.

Marches, losses by Rebels in, viii. 331 and note.

- Marine Heights, the, iv. 298.
- Marine hospital, iv. 428, 429.
- Marcopol, ix. 48—operations at, 78—the nature of the attack on, 80.
- Martinet, Captain, v. 271, 294.
- Marmont, General de la, accession of troops under, viii. 217—cordiality of relations of, with Lord Raglan, 218, 274; ix. 263—his order of the day on the death of Lord Raglan, 297.
- Marmont, the Son of, i. 262; vii. 91.
- Martinspry, General, ii. 204, 212; iii. 305, 320.
- Martin, General Wykeham, v. 209 and note.
- Martin's, Mr. Theodore, 'Life of the Prince Consort' referred to, vii. 466, note; ix. 291.
- Masse, Pasha, death of, ii. 206.
- Maude, Captain, Horse-artillery, iv. 11, 14 et seq.; v. 20, 50, 55.
- Maulverer, Colonel, his advance with a wing of the 36th Regiment, vi. 147, 148, 157, 169, 287, 290.
- Maulwell, Captain, iv. 290 note.
- Maupas, i. 242, 243, 246, 247.
- Maxe, Lieutenant, iv. 28; v. 214, 220, 327, 328 note.
- Maxwell, Mr. vi. 428.
- Maycock, Lieutenant, ii. 46.
- Mayow, v. 137.
- Mayow, Colonel, v. 209—his change, 270, 281, 286, 290, 297 et seq., 321.
- Mayow, General, at night attack on Hellingbank Redoubt, viii. 66, 71; ix. 145, 164, 169, 181, 211, 214, 270.
- Meat, fresh, and vegetables, the great difficulty in getting supplies of, vii. 91.
- Mediterranean, the, i. 34, 203.
- Medor, Captain of the, ii. 18.
- Melbourne, Lord, Administration, ii. 98.
- Memorandum of the State of June, ii. 76.
- Mendo, Captain, ii. 229, 230 note, 231 note, 244 note.
- Mensdorff Count, i. 107; ii. 198.
- Menzelhoff, Prince, appointment as ambassador to Constantinople, i. 192, 194—Turkish misgivings as to his mission, 105, 109, 129—commencement of struggle with Lord Stratford, 132, 133, 136, 139, 145, 148, 151, 153, 158, 160, 160—Turkish answer to the Russian demand, 169, 170, 171, 172, 177—his departure, 175, 274, 277; ii. 14, 61, 125, 131—the Alma, vol. II, chap. I.
- His withdrawal to the south of Sebastopol, iii. 248, 253, 308—the state of his troops, iv. 2, 16 note, 18, 24, 41, 46—his exaggerated works for the defence of Sebastopol, 44, 54, 55—he orders his army to assemble on the heights of Alma, 44, 51, 54, 55, 57, 61—he gives up his [loss of] capturing a stand on the Katska, on 27, 28, 29—he no longer has Korniloff's support to carry his plan, 58 et seq., 64, 81, 88, 90, 91—his pretext for the abandonment of Sebastopol, 90—encounter of his field army with Lord Raglan's force at Malakof Farm, 93, 94, 97, 99—state of confusion of the Prince and his army, 100, 101, 209—his promises of help to Sebastopol, 118, 122, 128, 131, 144, 149—Korniloff's opinion of his virtual retreat, 144, 156—his army, 144, 147—his tacit consent to Korniloff's assumption of command, 146—his flank march, 149—Tolleson's explanation of his conduct, 149, 150, 154 note, 167—the creation of his forces from the town, 168—the probable strength of his forces, 168, 169 et seq., 181, 200, 234—resumes the possession of the Malakof Heights, 241—he keeps the fate of Sebastopol in suspense, 276, 277, 279—sends reinforcements to reinforce the garrison, 28, 29—his movements on the morning of the first bombardment, 204, 220, 273—his departure, 204, 205, 206—his field army, v. 20—his purpose of sealing the defences of Malakof, 44, 452.
- Reinforcements despatched to, vi. 4, 16—his letter in cipher to the Governor of Warsaw, 17—establishes his headquarters near the ruins of Inkermann, 22, 30, 31, 31 note, 32—headquarters, 41, 72—northern half of Mount Inkermann left in his power, 74, 75, 77 note, 86, 100, 417 note, 420—his staff under distant artillery fire, 422, 424 note—his attempt to conform to the retreat, 441—his alteration with Danesburg, 45—the Russian retreat undertaken without his being consulted, 469—his demonstration against Balaklava, 444—he declines to come out of Sebastopol and bury the Russian dead, 447—atrocious acts of his soldiery, 468, 476, 492—his weak hold of Sebastopol, vii. 222 note—desertion of Sebastopol, vii. 213, 423—orders attack of Eupatoria, viii. 49—relieved of command, 59, 110, ix. 224—his order to sink the men-of-war, 232, 243, 260, 261.

 Metochikoff's negotiation, papers showing the causes which led to the rupture of, i. 280.
 Mezzies, Dr., vii. 134, 279, 478.
 Merivale, Herman, vii. 404.
 Metherovich, Prince, and the defense of the Sultan, i. 23, 244.
 Meynell, Lieutenant, ii. 210 of seq.
 Michael, Fort, iv. 48 of seq.
 Michael, Grand Duke, vi. 28.
 Michael, Prince, iii. 17 note, 91 note, 114 note, 184 note, 261.
 Michel, Mr., iv. 73 note.
 Mikrikoff Farm, vi. 75, 81.
 Mikrikoff Gian, vi. 49, 108, 114, 118, 119, 125, 142, 159 of seq., 213 note, 480.
 Miller, Alexander, Adjutant of the Guards, v. 153—his powerful voice, 28.
 Miller Lieutenant, v. 117, 214 note, vi. 123—his artillerymen have a singular conflict with the Russians, 123, 124.
 Milne's, Captain, courageous endeavours to charter vessels, vii. 41, 408 note.
 Milner-Gibson, Mr., ix. 258.
 'Minden yell,' the, vi. 204 and note.
 Minet, Captain, vi. 304.
 Mingrelia, ii. 242.
 Mining and counter-mining operations, ix. 271.
 Mining operations, skill of Todleben in, viii. 34, 361.
 Mining, science of, Todleben's skill in, viii. 34.
 Minor, Sergeant, vi. 242, 274, 279 note.
 'Mission,' of Niel, first knowledge of, received by Lord Raglan, viii. 220—paralysing effect of, 221 and note, 222.
 M.t, the, at Inkermann, vi. 484.
 Mitchell, Captain, iv. 264.
 'M trail,' the, iv. 130.
 Moecquard, i. 249.
 Moldavia, i. 192, ii. 160, 218.
 Moldavia and Wallachia, protectionists by Russia over, viii. 224.
 Möller, Lieutenant-General, iv. 64—commander of the land forces in Sebastopol, 101, 197, 224, 325, 332; vi. 19 of seq., 29 note, 40, 61, 24 note.
 Monck, iii. 210.
 Monet, General, vi. 51—at night attack on Sevastopol Redoubt, viii. 40, 365—receives severe wounds, 40—killed by Lord Raglan, 72.
 Morell, Mr., vii. 28.

Montagu, Captain, viii. 98.
 Montagu Lieutenant, iii. 147.
 Montebello, L. 204.
 Montenegro, troubles in, i. 78—Count Lamberg's Mission to the Porte, 78—Czar's mission to the Porte, 46.—disappearance of the Montenegro question, 122, ii. 123.
 Monteynard's brigade, ix. 182, 184 note.
 Montgomery, Comte, v. 150, 222, 234, 321.
 Morris, Colonel, iv. 26 of seq.
 Morgan, vi. 46, 473.
 Morgan (A.C.), vi. 139, 141.
 Morgan (A.C.), vi. 24 note.
 Morgan, Hon. Godfrey Charles, v. 177 note, 229.
 Morgan, Lieutenant George, vi. 261.
 Morry, Count de, i. 236—a speculator rather than a politician, 122—appointed to the House Office, 224, 226 of seq., 263 note; ii. 175.
 Morris, vi. 276 note.
 Morris, Captain, v. 43, 54—robbed by Lord Cardigan, 175 of seq., 212, 218 note, 224—his left squadron confronted by Russian cavalry, 250—his charge, 214—wounded and taken prisoner, 254, 261 note, 267—the escape of, 221—he sees the body of Nekras, 213—wounded, 237; vi. 179 note.
 Morris, Captain C. R.A., in action with his battery at Inkermann, vi. 473—his discovery of Brasidas lying wounded, yet busily firing, 46.
 Morris, General, French Cavalry, v. 97, 124, 273—his determination to support Lord Cardigan, 274, 279.
 Mortar Battery, fight at the, viii. 100; x. 146, 194.
 Moscow, Bishop of, and the wooden image, iii. 117 note, 148.
 Mossley, Mr., vii. 453.
 Motterough, General, viii. 220; ix. 32.
 Mount Hastings, v. 247.
 Mount Head, vi. 67 note, 68, 100, 101 of seq., 234, 257, 265 of seq., 276, 302.
 Mount Inkermann, v. 267 of seq.; vi. 4—the defence of, 4—expected attack on, 4, 28 of seq.; defensive works on, v.v. 3, 264—the redoubts on, ix. 26, 108 of seq.
 Mount Kastell, Jr. 244, 251, 252 of seq., 294, 299 note—signal shells sprung from, 294—the fire from the batteries, 303, 304, 317—French guns on, cease to fire, 320, 323 of seq.; vi. 52; viii. 14.
 Mowbray, Captain, vi. 274.
 Mundy, vi. 69 note.
 Mundy, Colonel, viii. 218 note, 219 note.
 Murdoch, Clinton, vii. 400.
 Murray, Lieutenant, ix. 166, 171—he is mortally wounded, 46.
 Murray, ix. 166.

Mushroom Battery, the, iv. 316.
 Musenden, Comet William, v. 222.
 Nuttallbury (Sub.), v. 164.

Nuchtmann, Admiral, his command, ii. 17; iv. 58, 72, 101, 120, 122, 124, 126, 127, 202; ix. 311.

Napier, Colonel, letter of, to Lord Fitzroy Somerset, iii. 482.

Napier, Sir Charles, General, iii. 103 note.

Napier's 'Peninsular War' referred to, vii. 404.

Napoleon, Prince, i. 93; ii. 804; iii. 26, 28, 38, 42—his Ardent desire the advance of, 67 et seq., 81, 104, 178 et seq., 179, 204, 206, 216, 323—his resemblance to his uncle in outward looks and in one of his intellectual abilities, 105, 141—the strength of his divisions, 103, 104, et seq., 31, 48—departure of, from Odessa, viii. 21 and note.

Napoleon and the Directory of 1793-97, allusion to, ix. 38.

Narrative, sources of the, i. p. xiv.

Nasmyth, Lieutenant, ii. 204, 205, 216.

Native auxiliaries, importance to England of, ii. 516.

Naval Brigade, operations of the, at Inkermann, vi. 8.

Naval forces of the Allies, ii. 202.

Naval Library, iv. 47, 50—the English seen from the observatory on its summit, 129, 130; ix. 231.

Naval officers, skill of, in night attacks, viii. 92 and note.

Nesselrode, Count, despatches, i. 40 note, 54, 142, 143, 170—his opinion of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, 144, 154, 161 note, 204, 205; ii. 1, 12, 21, 27, 113, 114, 141 note, 147; viii. 202.

Neville (Sub.), iii. 226; vi. 202.

Nevvettas, the Duke of, i. 225 et seq., 200 note—his drought instructions for the invasion of the Crimea, 244—those he submitted to his colleagues at Pashkov L.-gt., 14 et seq.—the 'Sleeping Cabinet,' 249, 250—text of his instructions to Lord Raglan, 200 et seq.—his share of blame for the Crimean disaster, vii. 118, 140—effect of Lord Raglan's despatches on, 201, 212, 240, 241—the Duke and Lord Raglan, the relations between, down to nearly the end of the year, 204, 205—his confidence in Lord Raglan, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208 et seq.—disposing him to throw blame on Lord Raglan and the Headquarters Staff, 208 et seq.—the duties of departments, 207 note—the sinister course of action attempted by him and the Government, 205, 210, 209, 200, 406 note—Ministers taken in their endeavour to overthrow Lord Raglan's staff officers, 279, 280—their reason for not recalling him, 28—the Duke as a statesman and administrator, 202, 204—the care of the sick, 258, 277, 284—his measures for accelerating telegraphic communication between Bulgaria and the Crimea, 267, 400, 405, 416.

Newspaper correspondents in the Crimea, vii. 204, 205—the modern war correspondent, 24—how their gathering in the Crimea freed their way to St Petersburg, 209, 211—Lord Raglan's letter on the subject of the Press, 212, 409—the cessation of the pernicious disclosures, 212, 214, 229—the general character of Russell's news, 24.

Nicholas I. The Empereur, i. 38—his career and character, 34 et seq.—conflict with English ministers, 79—his policy on the Shatt-el-Arab Question, 79—his plan to regard to the disturbances in New Georgia, 77—his views on the attitude of England towards Turkey, 34 et seq.—reception of his overtures by the British Government, 36—the Czar invited, 37—the result of Count Leboucq's mission, 38—the effect upon the Czar, 38, 101—proposal to put the Greek Church throughout Turkey under the protection of Russia, 38—his choice of Prince Menschikoff as ambassador, 103 et seq., 109—his rivalry with Sir Stratford Canning, 316—regards to the war himself communicated by Lord Stratford, 107, 179, 180, 191—his scheme for occupying the Danubian Principalities, 103 et seq.—his return upon the appointment of England, 194, 195, 204—state of, after knowing that the fleets of England and Russia were ordered to the mouth of the Dardanelles, 207, 208—his proclamation, 200; ii. 1—he prepares to invade Turkey, 20—his military error in occupying Balaklava, 20—he acts as and winter campaign, 40 et seq.—his reception of the 'English Peace Party,' 20—he invades Turkey, 221—the agony of the Czar after the battle of Giurgovo, 217—rumoured change in the plans of, 226; viii. 149—effects of his discontents before Balaclava, viii. 50—his death, 50—his fate as an example of justice administered to highly placed criminal & 40 note of his death sent to Schmettow, 116—effect of death of, on prospects of peace, 210—ii. 100—his apparent want of knowledge concerning the great defensive of Sebastopol, 200.

Nottingham, Port, iv. 46 et seq.

Whistler, Captain, vi. 241.
 Whistler, Grand Duke, vi. 26.
 Whistler, Captain, vi. 141.
 Nikolayev, iv. 78 note, 81.
 Sou, General, his 'Siège de Sébastopol' referred to, iv. 299 note, 328 note, 341 note—arrived of, in the Crimea, viii. 80—his mission, see the whole of chap. v.—at council of 4th March, 78, 117 et seq.—his position at French Headquarters, 118—his plan of campaign, 119, 120, 201—its execution, 120—case of plan opposed by 177, 181—comes to command of French Regiments, 214, 224, 225, 227—proposes concentration of Russian power, 201, 202, 204, 206 and mate of the Russian strength, ix. 7 note, 4, 20—though representing the Emperor, he enjoys an entire loss of power, 204, 206, 211, 219—quoted, 212, 216 et seq.—as the French were on the 18th June, 206 note, 243, 264, 265, 266, 276, 280, 281, 282—‘Journal des Opérations du Génie’ referred to, iv. 202.
 Mol's ‘Mission,’ duration of term done by, viii. 204.
 Mignard, Mme, her wholeness over the management of the military body-politic, vi. 201—her course and growth of her power, 200—her devotion to a painful enterprise, 200, 271, 272, 273, 277—the result of her energy, 204.
 Moncannon Battery, the, ix. 142.
 Noddall, Mr., iv. 226.
 Rose, Captain, i. 226, ii. 86 and note—his true origin, v. 186; the bearer of Lord Raglan's ‘fourth order’ to Lord Lucan, 201—his arrival with the ‘order,’ 197—altercation with Lord Lucan, 201, 211—his appearance and eager gesture in front of Cossack brigade, 216; his probable object, 216—his fate, 220—question as to the degree in which Blamey sent him to him, 221, 222—his letter to his mother, 220, 222, 227.
 Stewart, Major, ii. 67 note, 77, 91, 109 note, 111 et seq.
 Nutt, Troop-sergeant-major, v. 124.
 Northern Forts, the, iii. 238 et seq.—the strength of the works, 247.
 North of the River Don, vi. 220 et seq.
 North side, iii. 239 et seq.; iv. 146, 230 et seq.; vii. 198, ix. 216.
 North Side Lodge, iv. 167.
 North Valley, v. 34 et seq.—position of the Russians on the ridge, 33, 77, 78, 80, 87, 270 note, 101, 144, 146 et seq., 218 note, 224 et seq.—the total, 144.
 Novikovsky, Vice-Admiral, iv. 216.
 Nugent, v. 127.
 Numbers at Inkermann, author's author-by for his statements as to the, vi. 242.
 Ochterlony, vi. 451.
 O'Connor, Sergeant Lake, wounded in a charge against, i. 18 note—receives thanks on the field, vi. 221.
 Odessa, ii. 269—the governor of, and the Russian wounded, vi. 226 et seq., iv. 26.
 Officers and men, quality of the English, vi. 400.
 Officers killed and wounded at Inkermann, nominal return of, vi. 223.
 Oquivy, Colonel, ii. 210 et seq.
 O'Hara, Sergeant, v. 247 note, 220, 222, 224 note.
 Okhotnik Regiment, the, vi. 149 et seq.
 Old City Heights, vi. 20 et seq., 26, 28—proposed name of, v. 20 note, ix. 24.
 Oldershaw, Captain, arms No. VII, advanced battery, viii. 140—maintains his fire after every three hours fire fight of the 13th of Aug., 144, 146, 148, 149—the battery wrecked, 106, 141, 142, 143, 147, 151—losses and request made to Oldershaw by the survivors of the fight, 172, 173, 180, 181, 182, 183, 187.
 Oldfield, Captain, order of, on April 2—badiment, vii. 146, 189, 200—death of, 181 and note, 200.
 Old Port, ii. 216, 217, 220, 221 and note, 221 note, 24, 250, 260, 270, 271, 272, 273; ix. 224.
 Oldham, Captain, v. 226, 228, 229, 237.
 Oliphant, Lawrence, his instinctive power to see from where fields of action were opening, iii. 200—his report of the state of the land defences of Sebastopol, 261—the effect it produced, 212—his ‘Russian Shores of the Black Sea,’ vi. note—Lord Raglan sees him, vi.
 Oliphant, Mrs, her ‘Chronicle of Chippingford’ referred to, vii. 446 note.
 Olsaitza, ii. 217.
 Omar Pacha, i. 78—his forces in Montenegro, 76, 811—his opposition to Russia in Wallachia, ii. 99, 183—his array, 186, 192, 194, 197, 198, 206, 207, 208, i. 7, 224, 245, 254—in England, vii. 67, 84, 77, 78—order of, vi. 21 in the Crimea, 129—recommends vii. 82, 220, 229—refused, vi. 22—fears English treachery, 207; ix. 7, 9, 264—feeling of, on the death of Lord Raglan, 207.
 Orange south country, earthen, v. 116.
 Orders of the day and other papers issued by Russian general on the eve of Inkermann, vi. 246 et seq.
 Ordnance Board, vi. 46, 47 et seq.
 Department, ii. 26—the clerk of the 26, 449.
 ‘Ordnance,’ the, vii. 22, 23.

Ordnance, pieces of, taken from Char Robert & trencher, viii. 19, 360.

O'Reilly, Lieutenant Montagu, iv. 344 note.

Orion, Lieut.-Col. Lawrence C., ix. 360.

Orloff, Count, i. 192, 204, ii. 41.

Osrova, ii. 125.

Ouborn, Commander Shand, ix. 46—his operations at Ararat, ii. 46, 78.

Ouborne, Mr Sydney, vi. 202.

Ottoman Pasha, ix. 100.

Osmont, Major, governor of Eupatoria, viii. 50.

Osten-Sacken, General, viii. 19, 41, 78, 110, 152.

Otkarbi the village of, iii. 253 note; iv. 22 of seq., 98, 100, 154.

Ottoman empire, see the 'Contents' table of vol. I.

Ouchakovskaya, ix. 101.

Ouroouk, Colonial Prince, ix. 100 of seq., 310.

'Ouvrage Marce,' the, viii. 66—great extension of, 100.

Owen, William, vi. 212, 270 note.

Owen, Captain, viii. 215 note.

Owens, Ensign, vi. 61 note.

Paget, Agnes, Lady George, vii. 202, 444—at Lord Raglan's deathbed, ii. 247.

Paget, Lord George, ii. 373; v. 48 of seq., 213, 238, 239—his labour in regulating the advance, 240, 245—and advance of, with his Dragoons, 279, 281—further advance of, 282, 294, 295, 296, 304, 324, 328—he is one of the last to leave the valley, 218, 220, 321, vi. 302, 439 note.

Pakenham, iii. 91.

Pakenham, Colonel, appointed successor to General Blairstow, ix. 202.

Palmer, Anthony, vi. 237, 240.

Palmer, Lieut. Roger, v. 129, 278, 297, 314.

Palmerston, Lord, ii. 43-44, 164, 165—see also 78, 87, 238, ii. 24, 27 of seq., 31, 96 of seq., 105; viii. 202, 204, 205, 429 note, 439 note, viii. 242, 244, 264; ix. 241, 255.

Palma Martis (Son of Amor), the, viii. 204.

Pamphilotti, Admiral, treatment of Col. Kelly by, viii. 20 note.

Panfiloff, Admiral, iv. 44.

Pannier, Earl, appointed Secretary of State for War, vi. 285—his career and character, 286, 290, 291 his standard of merit, iv. 296 he was well provided with means for informing himself upon the business of the campaign, &c.—his despatch of the 12th February, 294—the outrageous words it contained, 295, 296, 297—his reception of Lord Raglan's despatch of 2d March, 291—his despatch in reply, &c.—expenses of the Government, including Lord Panmure, to remove the Headquarters Staff, 303, 304, 306—adoption of General Simpson's report, 307—instructions to the Sanitary Commissioners, 308—at Councils of War, viii. 242, 244—confidence of, in Lord Raglan, 244, 251, 304; ix. 346 his correspondence with Lord Raglan, 253 of seq., 2—27.

Partenayum (town of Karabah), viii. 200.

Parterre, A. de, iv. 40.

Para, the, battery, iv. 44 of seq., 78.

Parkinson, Mr, iv. 331.

Parliament, gloominess of, i. 187—meeting and adjournment of, vii. 201—the beginning of gambling board, 42.

Pushkevitch, the Cossack chief of, ii. 42—his counsels, 44—he proves the siege of Silistra, 204, 206, 208, 217, 244, vi. 17.

Pusey, the main, at the Alma, iii. 4, 6 of seq., 209, 279, 294, 314—defence of the, vi. 12, viii. 204.

Patt, General, ix. 20.

Patterson, Captain, v. 21 note.

Patterson, Sir Constantine, i. 178.

Patterson, Sergeant, v. 149 note.

Patterson, Colonel, vi. 107 note.

Pattie, Major W. H.

Pave, better as, the, ix. 44.

Paul Fort, iv. 4—of seq., vi. 20.

Pawler, Lord George, commanding Detachment, iv. 204 stands in no support the Agreement, 365.

Pavlov, Lord William, at battle of Balaklava, v. 48, 204, 292—in command at Sevastopol, vii. 200, 206, 209, 232 note.

Pavloff, General, at Inkermann, vi. 30 of seq., 39 of seq., 34 of seq.—his troops, 160, 170, 180 of seq.—his forces, 417, 458, 474, 478 of seq.

Paxton, Captain, vi. 170 note—his battery, 133 note, 135.

Peace negotiations, viii. chap. xii.

Peace negotiations with Russia, viii. 367 of seq.—union of Austria and Prussia with Western Powers, 42—defection of Prussia, 311—loyal course taken by Austria, 314—effect of Nicholas's death on prospects of peace, 315—peace negotiations at Vienna, 318—failure of peace negotiations, 324—the Austria pressman, 204—dead-lock in front of Sebastopol, 130 differences in counsels of Western Powers 214—negotiations of De L'Isle, 324—unscripted negotiations of Lord John Russell, 1, 324—unrest of English Cabinet, 42—France and England see note in substantial accord, 42—vote of House of Commons, 324—change brought about by rejection of Austrian proposals, 324.

'Peace party,' the, his intention to be friends with, 34; his efforts in bringing about the war, 34, II. 66-74, and,
141 of seq.

Pearson, Captain, III. 292.

Pearl, Captain William, IV. 298 of seq.—
book of, 412; VI. 273; in chap. vi.

Peel, General, VII. 317, 472 note.

Peel, Sir Robert, the Minister, his conference with Nicholas I., I. 70; VII.
276.

Peel's connection, the, VII. 302.

Peelite Ministers, accusation of the four,
VII. 307—their successors, 308—effect of the change, 38.

Pellier, General, II. 199, 214 note—appointed to command of 1st Corps d'Armée, VIII. 41—his victorious fight for Jena over Napoleon, 21—had the Generalissimo's good will, who was afraid of being dethroned by him, but for the loss of all that had been growing up around the persecuted Emperor in accordance with the same General's views, he was compelled to command, 206, 207 note—request declined by, 34, and note—command transferred to, 206, 305.

Pélissier, the new French commander, in, I—the nature of the man, 1-4—comes at once to complete accord with Lord Raglan, as far as war is to be 'irrevocably' adopted, and thrusts himself into a state of violent conflict with his Emperor, 13, 18—the fight that, at great cost of men, he victoriously maintains against some new counter-approaches, chap. II.—the steely rage between him and Louis Napoleon, he maintaining his purposes rigidly against the Emperor, as a son to the Emperor in army, that is, General Niel, chap. III.—in defiance of the Emperor, he concurs with Lord Raglan in despatching the new Expedition to Kertch, and rejects the prohibition by which his sovereign strove to prevent an attack upon Anapa, chap. IV.—in the defiance of the Emperor's will, he, in concert with Lord Raglan, executes the third bombardment, and victoriously storms all the counter-approaches thrown out in the Karabattaya, chap. V.—the rage and asti-genousness of his sovereign continuing, and inflicting upon him great torment, he loses during some days the full command of his powers, makes huge mistakes, and brings on himself the discomfiture of the 18th of June, chap. VI, and VII.—though suffering under all circumstances a more than common load of distress, he meets the trial with courage, and proves himself great in adversity, 210 of seq.—
the consequences of his independence of Marshal Vaillant, the War Minister, and still, though with rather more caution than before his independence, finds off the irksome dictation attempted by Louis Napoleon, 243, 244—thrown by Lord Raglan's death into a frenzy of grief, he records the event in his celebrated General Order addressed to the Army of the East, 258, 257.

Pentz, Max, Captain, battery, VI. 23
note, 257—his guns, 164.

Pentzlicher, General, at the Alma, II.
65 note, 87, 96, 119 note, 197, 431, 445, 454, 467—at Inkermann, disposition of his troops before the assault, II. 8, 14, 29 of seq.—in charge of Mount Inkern-man, II. 57, 66, 46—the enemy's design to overpower, 47, 48—he has a line of pickets, 66 note, 70, 76, 81, 88, 100—
the plan of defence adopted by him, 101, 102—his control not superseded by Lord Raglan's presence on the field, 102—the Russian troops he had to encounter, 111, 116—the Under-Dard column closing upon him early, 119 of seq.—the decisive fighting on his left, 132, 134, 167, 168, 184, 185, 186, 190, 170, 171, 172, 173, 185, 187—his desire to get French troops to move, 205, 210, 217, 221, 222, 224, 226, 227, 228, 229—the assault on the Glorieux Ridge, 226, 231 note, 234—he is assailed on his own ridge, 217, 226, 226 note, 232, 236—his disposition of the Anglo-French force, II. 240, 244, 246, 247, 241, 242 and note, 234—the ruins of his works, 242 and the cap., 243 —wishes to have time to get his interview with Lord Raglan and Generals
Robert, 244—his proposed advance, 246, 247—the strength thrown against his columns, II. 246—his outpost system, 471, 473, 479, 481 note.

Pentzlicher's report, extract from, to the Committee of War, dated the 2nd October (quoting Borodovsk)

1854, VI. 515.

Penninsula, the, IV. 290.

Pepys (Sack), V. 116.

Pera, VI. 131.

Percy, Colonel Henry, III. 209, 218; VI.
211, 218, 246—his measures, 250—his return from the fight, 252, 264 of seq.

Percy, Mr. Jewelline, VII. 262.

Percy Smith, Lieutenant, V. 229.

Perekop, II. 263—battle of, 263; III. 12.

Pership, the, IV. 46, 518, 530; IV. 107, 108.

Perronet, General, I. 264.

Perryay, I. 235—his intimacy with Louis
Bonaparte, 242.

'Personal King,' the, VII. 50.

Personal Monarchy, the fall of, under George III. in 1801, VII. 417.

Powers, Mr., 112.
 Pote, Mr., and Mr. Datta, the contractors, vii, 434, 474.
 Phillips, Lieutenant, III, 90; v, 206, 308.
 Pickets of the Second Division, the arrangements under which the were furnished at the Inkermann time, vi, 102.
 Pickets, table showing the numbers of the Second Division out on picket or skirmishing as picket supports, and comparing approximately the number of collected troops remain at available for the second period of the fight, vi, 518.
 Piquet Horse, the, II, 206.
 Picard, L, 24 note.
 Pitt, Mr., vi, 90, 91 et seq., 99, 100, 101.
 Picard, Henry, state of the dispute regarding the, I, 120, 142, 164.
 Piezon, Dr., 207.
 Print factory, II, 188.
 Pilgrim, Lieutenant, II, 206.
 Poland, suggested invasion of, II, 207.
 Polish Council, II, 109.
 Polkoff, II, 120, 122.
 Pope, Mr., 20.
 Portal, Captain, v, 202.
 Post road, the, crossing the field of battle at Inkermann, vi, 73 seq., 94, 116, 143 et seq., 199, 227, 300, 301, 302, 311 et seq., 336, 354, 356, 358, 361 et seq., 377 et seq., 410 et seq., 420, 424 et seq., 451.
 Powell, Colonel, vi, 200 note; vii, 401.
 Power, Mr., vii, 246 note.
 Powers, encord of the, papers on the, II, 207.
 Powers, the representatives of the four, associated at Constantinople, I, 174—policy involved in the step, II.—animosity of the four representatives, 178—their measures, II.—Russia's ultimatum, 176—its rejection, 177—assured of the, 178—the French Emperor's scheme for superseding the action of the four, 183—treaty between the Sultan and the, II, 172.
 Poole & George, Owners, II, 206 note; IV, 47.
 Pravdin, N, 202.
 Prayer, Russian, for victory, II, 206 and note, 240.
 Prendergast, Gorst, v, 117, 164.
 Prendergast, Dr., II, 206, 207.
 Prince Consort and the Government, vii, 110.
 Principality, the, I, 20.
 Privalov, John, vi, 200.
 Pressure, English, government treatment of, by the Russians, v, 240—and in particular of General Kelly, VII, 90 note.
 Projection, weight of, in one salvo, VII, 400 note.
 Protasch, Baron, at Vienna Conference, VIII, 319.
 Prokophineff, Colonel, IV, 207.
 Proprietary, I, 202.
 Prussia, King of, effect of personal government by the, II, 120—her share in causing the war, 184.
 Prussia, personal government in, I, 10—foreign policy of, 34—defection of, vi, 311, 312, 313 note—exclusion of, from Conference, 317 and note—Lord John Russell at Court of, 190.
 Pruth, the, passed, I, 200, 204; II, 78, 10, 140, 161; IV, 191.
 Publicity, danger arising from, vii, 212.
 Pulkin, John, vi, 273, 274 et seq.
 Pulkin, Private, VI, 206.
 Quarantine Station, the, vi, 21.
 Quarantine Bay, the, II, 20, 246 et seq.; vi, 21 note, 471 note; IX, 17, 20.
 Quarantine Park, the, II, 148.
 Quarantine Sea-fort, IV, 46 et seq., 200, 246—its defences, 246 et seq., 248, 250, vi, 48.
 Quarantine Station, the, at Karsk, II, 24, 57.
 Quarrel, the Work of the, II, 20, 24 et seq., 25, 114, 116, 118 et seq., 170, 174, 184 et seq.
 Quarry Ravine, the, II, 201 et seq.; VI, 20 et seq., 113 et seq., 14 et seq., 40 note, 161, 178, 181, 182 et seq., 214, 215, 240, 257 et seq., 256, 275, 287, 291, 297 et seq., 303 et seq., 311 et seq., 320, 327 et seq., 328 et seq., 334 et seq., 339 et seq., 444 et seq., 450.
 Quarter-guard Point, vi, 78, 100.
 Queen's Speech, the, August 1854, I, 364—Jan, 21st, II, 74.
 Queen, the, her letter to the Duke of Newcastle on the proposed attack on Sebastopol, II, 273, 274—question why there was an 'if'—Herbert Taylor's to arrest the desperate of Lord Raglan's—outrageous words to Lord Raglan, II, 204, 207—her Majesty's profound grief at Lord Raglan's death, II, 206—her message to the army, 206—her private letter of condolences to Lady Raglan, 204.
 Radcliffe, Mr., 107.
 Radiviloff, Prince, v, 202.
 Raglan, Lord, commander of the British forces in the East. See vol. II, II, IV, V, VI, VII, VIII, and IX.
 Railways, the, from Balaklava, vi, 200.
 Rakovitch, Colonel, v, 20.
 Rambova, II, 41.
 Battles, defences in time of, vii, 404—of the French soldier, 400.
 Ravennelli, Lieutenant, II, 116.
 Rawlinson, Lieutenant, v, 117.
 Rawlinson, Mr., VII, 201, 202 note.

Bandy, Jeremiah, vi. 262.
 Deserter—of the army's trust by Lord Paget, vi. 262.
 Bonnington, Major given to, by the command of a general, vi. 262.
 Bodan, Little, the, iv. 169—closing the gorge of, viii. 23; vi. 148, 153, 160.
 Bodan, the, iv. 82 note, 85, 153, 174, 178, 248 of seq.—preparations to storm the fort, 82, 83, 87, 100—he was writing to Mr. S. J. Smith at seq., 421, 422—great exertion in the 17th retreat of the British Infantry posted near the fort—defensive condition of, 80—the opportunity there was for assaulting it, 81—expenses which prevented 100 Alton Potts to seize the opportunity, 82—the dimming of the, 83 of seq., 831, 84, 13—pushing forward batteries against, 100—failure of Reg. Inf. to attack against, 100—Reg. Inf. capture of the, 107, 173, 174, 175, 180 of seq.—the heavy fire from, 107—the bombardment of the, 108—British losses resulting from the action, 109—the batteries of, 108 of seq.—the loss of his corps, 104—objection to plans involving attacks on, 173—assault on the, from a distance, out of harmony with the rest French troops, 109—General Ross on the proposed attack on the, 200, 204, 208, 214.
 Bodkin Potts, the, 40.
 Bodkin, in his general, distinguished from his special ones, vi. 14, second note.
 'Bodenk, Great,' at the Alou, vii. 10 of seq., 27—storming of the, 116 of seq., 144, 200—the parapet of the, 212, 213, 214 of seq.—D. of Chantre master of the, 204, 216.
 'Bodenk, Lesser,' vi. 14.
 Bonaparte, Baron Peer, v. 262.
 'Bon Tape,' the days of, vii. 2.
 Bonaparte, Private, his own flight, vii. 73—blame justly attaching to, and the Ministers, 86, 87.
 Bonelli, L. 120, 156.
 Bonelli Potts, the, 173, 174, 184, 193, 194, 411; 8, 192.
 Retrospective inquiry, &c. on the English war administration, vi. 46 ff.
 Bontlinger, Captain, ix. 192.
 Bayball, L. 264.
 Bayland, H. 168.
 Bayardine, Colonel, vi. 104, 183.
 Bécher, vi. 171.
 Béchard, Captain, vi. 180.
 Beaumont, G., or R. defense Revere's line of entrenchments at Wornonoff Ridge, viii. 29.
 Bedley, General, iii. 428.
 Béhat Potts, the 110 of seq., 183.

Bille-pits, striking of, viii. 14.
 Bill, English word of hand to make a, vi. 230—made of last by our men from Balaklava to Balaclava, &—and by Russian troops to the N. E. between Balaklava and the sea, 400 of seq.
 Bimet, Imperial, the, ix. 48.
 Bimet quarter, the, vii. 26 of seq.
 Biedermeier, the, vi. 244 of seq., 245; ix. 219—the French establish new batteries overrunning the, 220.
 Boundary between camp and park, vii. 96, 100, 102.
 Roberts, Major E. H., v. 361.
 Roberts, Mr., i. 200 note.
 Roberts, Mr John, ix. 68, 70 of seq., 701.
 Robertson, Captain, v. 144.
 Robertson, General, v. 148.
 Robertson, Lieutenant, v. 200.
 Rockfort, Colonel, i. 204.
 Rockfort, Lieutenant, viii. 216.
 Rockwood, C. General, vii. 4, 120.
 Red Lyon Farm House, burning of the, by the Russians, iv. 60.
 Randolph, Mount, the silent gun on, iv. 410, 426—reconnaissance sent by the Russians to, 421, 426, 446, 448.
 Roebuck, Mr. J. A., vi. 201—his motion, 69 note—his committee, 201—his peculiar position in the Army of Occupation, 212, 213, 220.
 Roger de la Poer, L. 206.
 Rogers, Assistant County-Guard, vi. 200 note.
 Rogers, Commander, vi. 277 note.
 Rogers, Frederick, vi. 400.
 Roman, Mr. Judge-Advocate, his private life referred to, vi. 8 note, 40 note—and his notes, 100 note 200 note, vi. 172 note; vi. 400; vii. 204 and note, 41.
 Rooper River, vi. 200 note, 271.
 Rose Captain, vi. 81, 148 note.
 Rose, General, i. 194—Robert Potts's message to, 118—dimensions of the Town of Balaclava to General Rose, 120; ii. 121, 195; iv. 202 note; ix. 189.
 Rose, General, M. 214, iv. 214 note, 214 note—on the disengagement of the French, 428.
 Rose, Major, vi. 90.
 Rose, Mr Hugh, vi. 204 note.
 Rose's diary quoted, vii. 400.
 Rose, M. 194.
 Rose, Captain, v. 215; vii. 204, 207.
 Rose, Sir Hew, vii. 22.
 Roumelle, H. 168, 184.
 Rousseau, M., a functionary of the French War Office, and a member of the Academy, his 'Histoire de la Guerre de Crimée' quoted, vii. 427 of seq.; viii. 199 note, 201 note, 203 and note; vi. 217 note, 22 note, 245 note, 246 note.
 Routh's, Mr Randolph, 'Observations

Mr. Governmental Services' referred to, vii. 413 note.

Bowen, Lieut.-General Sir William, vi. 472 note.

Bowland, Captain, vi. 97.

Budger, General, i. 104.

Bum, the value of, vii. 481.

Brown, Mr., a French Minister, i. 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43—his services to France, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43—his memory v., 420 against the great attack made upon him in the summer of 1855, 325 of seq., 326, 327, 328 & seq., 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335.

Russell, Mr. Odo, vii. 186.

Russell, Mr. W. H., of the 'Times,' vii. 208, 209, 211, 212, 220—the general character of his narratives, 208, 211.

Russell, Sir Charles, vi. 184, 187, 204, 213, 214.

Russia, personal Government in, i. 10—power of, 14—natural ambition of, 67—the irresolute nature, 63—her share in bringing about the war, ii. 137.

Russian army, the, the noxious state of, iv. 24—sufferings of the, vii. 144.

Russian batteries, armament of those which were opposed to the batteries of the besiegers on the 17th of October, iv. 420.

Russian battery of the wounded, vi. 41—casualty of Captain Burns on the duty, 41.

Russian cavalry strength of the, under General G. T. M. L. S. Imperial Guards, 20, 21, 22 & grade 2, 23.

Russian fleet, the, during April bombardment, viii. 183—losses during, 184.

Russian F.M. Army, to 162.

Russian forces engaged in field operations during the battle of Inkermann, vi. 407, 408, 409.

Russian sea-fort batteries, strength and armament of the three, which were engaged by the allied fleets, iv. 409.

Russian ships, sinking of, viii. 110.

Russian soldiers, their opinion of the English army, iii. 42.

Russ. in troops to be landed, numbers of, viii. 159.

Russ. in loss of the, by the fight on Mount Inkermann, vi. 404.

Russia, strength of the, ix. 1.

Russians, the, decline to come out of Sebastopol and bury their dead, vi. 447.

Rustchuk, ii. 208, 210.

Russian Festa, v. 49, 50.

Ryan, James, vi. 249.

Ryloff, General, commander of the great train of cavalry which had waited by Sevastopol in the plain of Balaklava,

v. 46, 73, 86, 91, 104, 105, 106, 107 note, 282.

Sacred customs of the priests of the Greek Church, ix. 315.

Saddle-top Ranch the, vi. 68 of seq., 119 of seq., 114, 126, 136, 143, 154 of seq., 211, 273.

Sack, or the, viii. 186, vii. 202.

Saint, 2421 and energy of the, ii. 103—losses borne by our, in April bombardment, viii. 182.

Saint-Arnaud, Achille, Marshal, i. 241—he found in Algiers by Major Fleury, ii.—is captured and made Minister of War, iii. 166 & seq., 168 of seq., 174, 175, 180—his scheme for obtaining the command of the Turkish army, 184, 189—his scheme for obtaining the command of the English troops, 189—this defeated, 190, 191, 192, 204—the force under him at Varna, 204—his fall from a regarding the Russian forces in the Crimea, 254, 255, 256, 264 of seq., 267, 270, 277, 284, 286, 288, 289, 290, 291, 298, 307 of seq., 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317—he commands the Russians, iii. 20, 21, 24, 25 & seq., 26, 28, 32 note, 40, 71—he pushes forward his reserves, 73, 74, 82—his responsibility for the position of Prince Napoleon, 184—his position, 180—his situation at the Alma, 200, 208 of seq., 204, 214 of seq.—‘miracles’ done by his troops, 215, 216 and note of seq., 237 of seq., 249, 254—failure of the attempt to induce him to attack the Star fort, 276 & seq., 286—his serious illness, 409; iv. 2, 3, 16, 20—he ceases to command the French army, 37—his death, 40; viii. 256—his early intrigues, ix. 268, 269.

St. Clair, Ensign, iii. 20.

St. Clement's Corps, vi. 134, 135, 173, 184, 187 of seq., 212, 213, 219—Russian column in, confronted by 94th, 248-250, 261, 266, 267, 268, 269 note.

St. Elias, the Church of, v. 26.

St. George, Ministry of, vi. 64.

St. George's Bays, vi. 24 & seq., 25, 26 & seq., 140, and 140 note, 202.

St. Georges, N., i. 246, 251.

St. Georges' Ravine, vi. 74, 212, 213, 441, 441 of seq.

St. Nicholas, fort of, ii. 321.

St. Paul, Cape of, iii. 46.

St. Laurent, M., viii. 20.

St. Luk, ii. 356.

Sainte-Croix, the French fleet suddenly ordered to, i. 107.

Saintonge, ii. 14, 17.

Saintonge Detour, i. 14, 150 note—of tobacco, called by French troops the ‘charbois,’ or slaughter-houses, vi. 66.

100, 114, 140, 149, 200, 210, 270, 274 the force near the, 174, 181, 182 & 27, 187, 188, 189 & seq., 194—visit of Colonel Walker to the, 203, 204, 211, 214, 215, 219, 221—the vice of the position maintained at, 220,
221, 222 & seq., 224, 227, 228,
234, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 242, 244,
246, 247 & seq., 248—loss of the English at the, 452, 454, 476.
Sandeman (Sub.), v. 140.
Sanitary Commission, appointment
of, vi. 200, 201, 205.
Sankey, Captain, ii. 554.
Sankey, Quartermaster-General's Department, ii. 201.
Sapoundjia, the, iv. 68, 200 &
seq.; vi. 27, 47; vii. 8.
Sapoundjia Metev, iv. 44.
Sapoundjia Nigas, the, iii. 207, vi. 6, 10
—position of Cardigan's brigade on the, 13, 28 & seq.
Sappers' Road, the, vi. 78 & seq.—On West Rd., p. 78—Road, th., 427—
the East Sappers' Road, 78, 80 & seq., 81, 82, 83, 87.
Sarkashsky, M., ix. 221.
Sardinia, declaration of war by, viii.
217, 274.
Sardinian troops, arrival of, in the Crimea, viii. 210—relations between Lord Raglan and, 48, 274 note feeling of the, on the death of Lord Raglan, ix. 207.
Sargent, Captain, at the Alma, iii. 219 and note, 220—in Inkerman with the night pickets, and afterwards charging with a wing of the 96th in St
Clement's George, vi. 26 note, 26, 244,
25., 308 note, 305, 400 note, 415 note.
Sauer Lake, Russian troops at, viii. 24.
Saunders, Thomas, vi. 240.
Saunders, iii. 166.
Saurin's brigade, ix. 100.
'Saxo-Norman' measure, iv. 18 note.
Sayer, iii. 187; vi. 273 note.
Sayler, Hilton, vi. 242.
Sayler's connection quoted, ix. 209 note.
Scarlett, General, the command of the Heavy Dragoons, v. 18 & seq., 21 in march during the battle of Balaklava with a part of his brigade, when, a mass of Russian cavalry appearing on his left, as forms his plan of action, 27 & 28 strength of the Russian force encircling him, 27—his task, 104, 105—his advance, 106, 113, 117, 118, 120, 121, 133—English opinion of the charge = th. 200 of the Greys and Lancashires, 140–144, 146 his task but very fate, and through the Russian column, 150 result of the fight of his brigade with the Russian cavalry, 161—congratulations met to, by Lord Rag-lan, 140, 145, 146—position afterwards of his heavy cavalry brigade,
197, 214, 244, 245 note, 298, 347 note,
347, 351—his staff, 413.
Schamyl, II. 266.
Schaw, Captain, iii. 59.
Schillers, General, II. 200, 217.
Schools, iv. 150.
Searcarts Redoubt, iv. 54—house occupied by, viii. 194—lodgments in front of, 103—captured by French, 219.
Scots Peer Guards at the Alma, i.
214 and note, 215 & seq.—note respecting the operations of the, 417—at Inkerman, vi. 203 & seq.
Scots Greys, meeting of the, III. 222.
Secretary Colonel v. 45, 54.
Security in the service, vii. 100, 101.
Sebastopol, vi. 100 note, 101, 102,
103, 200, 245, 267 note, 267, 268, 269,
269 & seq., 304, 305.
Sea of Azov preferred passage into the,
viii. 264—importance of occupying, 269.
Seeger, Lieutenant, v. 200, 202, 203, 207.
SEASIDE POL AFTER THE ENGAGEMENT OF 18TH JUNE; the wall between waiting armies between Sebastopol and Sebastopol, ix. 210—the garrison and its state of feeling towards the close of the engagement, 217—the Osra's Industry in grave need of encouragement, 218—whence apparently the fabrication of the 18th of June, & thanksgiving, 220—first night of the garrison to wait for a final victory or defeat, 221—Tolstoben wounded, 221—and removed from Sebastopol, th. the next he still took the way to work, still wounded, he had brought his power to bear, 222—the difference caused by his removal, 40.—to thanksgiving thenceforth for the Russia's, 222—but a growing defeat in the field, 40—the position of Tolstoben in Sebastopol, 40.—and in the war generally, 224—the glory attaching to the early defense of Sebastopol, 225 the hope from the Russians themselves, 40.— words respecting the early defense of Sebastopol, i. 223—inferences to be drawn from the early defense of Sebastopol, 224—defense of Sebastopol after the 17th of October, 40.—
Tolstoben, th.—his separate part in the war, 226—a popular maxim twice over refuted by the early defenders of Sebastopol, 226—Tolstoben personal glory derived from the subsequent reverses of Russia, 227.
Semavgorod AT RAY: the undertaking to defend it to all parts of the sea defenses, 40—the sea defenses, 40—nature of the ground on the land side of, 51—sheeress of land defenses

on the North Side, 54—the armament of the works, 54—strength and disposition of the Russian forces in the Crimea, 55—abundance of the Russian stores of ammunition and provisions, 56—the Armada left, 6—General pol., 60.—progress of the work for the land defences, 61—strength of the garrison left in, 64—Sebastopol on the day of the Alma, 65—Korniloff ordered to sink ships in the roadstead of Sebastopol, 66—beginning of the naval campaign, 67—71—Korniloff summons a council of admirals and naval captains, 73—he proposes to attack the allied fleet, 74—
75—Korniloff orders the harbour to be closed by sinking ships, 76—Todleben's survey of the ground around Sebastopol, 79—southward retreat of Menschikoff's army, 80—the doomed ships scuttled, 81—Korniloff's further effort to save the ships, 86—ended career of the Black Sea fleet, 84—the policy of sinking the ships, 87—Menschikoff's idea of a fresh assault by the land army, 88—his abandonment of Sebastopol, 89—the defence left mainly to sailors, 91—the main army marches out of, 92—Menschikoff's want of knowledge of the movements of the Allies, 97—his retreat to the Katcha, 100—Menschikoff's three vicegerents left to set in Sebastopol, 101—the perfect concord between Korniloff and Todleben, 102—Korniloff assumes the command of the North Side, 117—his despair of being able to defend the North Side, 118—the Russian danger shifted from the North to the South Side, 120—the forces available for the defence of the South Side, 121—Korniloff impressed with the supreme command, 126—his rise and extension of his power, 126—Korniloff and Todleben devote themselves to the defence of the South Side, 126—number of available fleet in, 126—the town without supplies of water, 127—dangerous position of the garrison in, 129—solennity enacted on the lines of defence, 130—enthusiasm excited by Korniloff, 131—Todleben's opinion and plan, 136—Korniloff and Todleben give orders to draw up the fleet and a party to be sent to the defences, 137—Todleben's desire to bring back all the divisions from the Allies might be swept down by a wind, 138—Korniloff to send these orders, 139—Todleben's way of attacking the harbour, 140—an attempt made to keep upon the business of defence, 141—Quarantine personal influence on the outcome, 148—Korniloff's real impressions at this time, 149—Sot's first still unbroken, 147—communication at last from Menschikoff, 148—his determination to take up a position on the Dnieper, 149—this was a withdrawal from participation in the defence of, 150—Sot's, the Allies still refraining from an attack, 151—the encouragement of the garrison, 152—the guns brought to Gatchina, 153—the general result which had been attained, 153—the garrison have now an entrenched position, 154—but no army to man it, 155—for Menschikoff still withdraws however, 155—armistice now issued from the tsardom by Menschikoff as the general representative, 156—the Duke, the Allies still abstaining from attack, 157—the continued guard of the Russian army on the North Side, 158—Monteville's interview with Korniloff, 157—his interview still to hand now, and leaving Bobastoyol to his own resources, 158—Korniloff's memorandum, 159—Korniloff's explanation of the course of events of events, 160—proof of his innocence of his conduct, 163—the defence of, during the last days of August, 164—the circumstances under which the Allies abstained from attacking, 167—their first reconnaissance of the defences on the South Side, 168—the question which really needed solution, 170—the counsel of Sir Edmund Leach, 168—the proposal for an assault and its rejection by the French, 172—determination to land the troops-attack, 173—Sir George Cathcart's suggestion, 174—renewed counsels from Lyons, 176—Lord Raglan steers an attack, 177—unanimity of opinion among the French, 178—their opinion stated by Soult on, 178—the argument against assaulting without first getting down the enemy's fire, 179—argument in favour of capturing it down, 181—second proposal for the assault of, submitted by Lord Raglan to the French, 182—the answer, 183—the opposition of Canrobert, 180—Lord Raglan's knowledge of the instructions given to Canrobert, 181 note—the weight of authority by which Lord Raglan was supported, 182—there were also the origins of the differences between the French and himself, 183—the effect of abstaining from an assault, 182—Ailey's letter to Lord Raglan, 184—Todleben's opinion on the opposition to the assault, 185—the third of the 'four conditions,' 186—date of the Anglo

French fleet to the fortifications, 216—the terms of the armistice proposed by the fleet, 218—the Russians now secure on the North Side, 220—no investment practicable, 221—the lost opportunity of isolating Sebastopol, 225—change in the whole character of the enterprise, 223—the predicament of the Allies, 226—disposition of the allied armies at the commencement of the siege, 228—the defensive arrangements of the Allies, 227—works of circumvallation on the Sapountz Ridge, 236—disposition of the French force charged with the defence of the Chersonese, 238—position of the English army, 239—not strength of the ~~position~~<sup>position</sup> of the ~~position~~<sup>position</sup> of the Chersonese, 239—partial success of the ~~plan~~<sup>plan</sup> required for the attack, 240—Lord Raglan's arrangements for the capture of the ~~position~~<sup>position</sup> of the Colchian Campbel to the command of, 240—the position of the French and British forces, 240—the beginning of the siege-train, 240—beginning of English ~~on the~~<sup>on</sup> plan of the disposal of Lord Raglan, 240—Korniloff occupies the Kachino Ridge, 241—the garrison becoming bold, 241—the plan of attack adopted by the Allies, 242—preparation of the ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> of the English and French forces, 242—Lord Raglan names his additional generals of infantry, 242—their resistance to the proposed ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup>, 242—in other, 242—John Simpson as the ~~name~~<sup>name</sup> of the ~~various~~<sup>various</sup> general, 242—and Raglan's ~~succession~~<sup>succession</sup> to the French, 242—business commenced by the English, 242—French advanced position on Street Battery, 242—their front general, 243—the progress of the French works, 244—the ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> and ~~defence~~<sup>defence</sup>, 244—the ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> commenced by the English, 244—the English open their fire—desire that the fort should take part in the attack upon, 244—Lord Raglan re-sets and ~~sets~~<sup>sets</sup> the ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> General, 244—it was necessary to give the help asked, 244—naval division, 244—the actions of the ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> General, 244—the plan of the ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> General against the ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> of the English, 244—the ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> determined upon, 244—the ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> of ~~the~~<sup>the</sup> ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> General in the ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> of the English, 244—~~the~~<sup>the</sup> ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> General keeps the ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> General in suspense of his intentions to give it the aid of the fleet, 244—Lord Raglan gives a ~~reassurance~~<sup>reassurance</sup>, 244—does not give any aid and supplies help, 244—the strength of the ~~position~~<sup>position</sup> of the ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> General, 244—increased importance of the ~~position~~<sup>position</sup> to defend, 244—the ~~plan~~<sup>plan</sup> of the parted ~~fort~~<sup>fort</sup> which the ~~plan~~<sup>plan</sup> had ~~been~~<sup>been</sup> at the mercy of the Allies, 244—the French break ground, 244—progress of the English works, 244—Aveen's view of the determination of the ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> General to ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> by the ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> General ~~in~~<sup>in</sup> the ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> of the ~~position~~<sup>position</sup> of the works, 244—increased strength of the land defences of, 244—the garrison ~~of~~<sup>of</sup> the ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> General ~~in~~<sup>in</sup> the ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> of the ~~position~~<sup>position</sup> on the 17th October, 244—Attack of the 17th of October; considerations throwable to the ~~progress~~<sup>progress</sup> of the garrison, 244—the arrangements of the Allies for ~~overcoming~~<sup>overcoming</sup> the ~~resistance~~<sup>resistance</sup> of the Russian ~~troops~~<sup>troops</sup>, 244—opening of the fire, 244—the extent of the ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> in the ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> General and Royal Batteries, 245—the state of the Russian works, 245—Admiral Korniloff's great activity, 245—the state of the ~~conflict~~<sup>conflict</sup> at this time, 245—~~the~~<sup>the</sup> ~~plan~~<sup>plan</sup> of Tchoutch's dispositions beginning to be, 245—the ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> to a French magazine, 245—second explosion in the French ~~line~~<sup>line</sup> the ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> General ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup>, 245—changes from ~~General~~<sup>General</sup> to Lord Raglan & the opportunity not seized by the Russians, 245—the English alone engaged with the ~~army~~<sup>army</sup> in ~~the~~<sup>the</sup> ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> General ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup>, 245—loss of ~~the~~<sup>the</sup> ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> General ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> from the ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> General ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> and ~~the~~<sup>the</sup> ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> General ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup>, 245—Korniloff's visit to the fortifications, 247—his death, 247—His death left Sebastopol under divided command, 247.

The ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> ~~time~~<sup>time</sup> originally fixed for, 244—postponed at the request of the French, 245—a new plan of attack ~~was~~<sup>was</sup> made by the French, 246—particulars of the new plan, 247—the ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> ~~was~~<sup>was</sup> rescheduled ~~according~~<sup>according</sup> to the new plan, 247—From a ~~plan~~<sup>plan</sup> ~~made~~<sup>made</sup> by the English captain, 248—arrangements for the ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup>, 249—the guns were ~~to~~<sup>to</sup> be used in ~~the~~<sup>the</sup> ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> the ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> General, 249—the purpose intended in the French plan, 249—the French determine to attack the Quarantine battery, 249—the ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> ~~was~~<sup>was</sup> the joint plan of the Allies, 249—the fire opened by the Russian force, 249—opening of the fire by the French, 250—the result of the ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup>, 250—attack by the French fleet on Fort Alexander and its results, 250—the cause of its failure, 250—the works which were to be assaulted by the ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup>, 250—the ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> factory and Fort One thousand, 250—the ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> of the fort, 250—the ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> ~~attack~~<sup>attack</sup> of the ~~Admiral~~<sup>Admiral</sup> battery, 250—DURANT paper of instructions, 250—the delivery of

Continued bombardment: continuance of the bombardment carried on by the English, 434—its effect upon the Redan and the defences in its rear, 435—great explosion in the Redan, 436—the effect, 437—retreat of the Russian Infantry posted near the Redan, 437 defenceless condition of the Redan, 438—the opportunity there was for capturing it, 439—the state of the Redan, 440—want of preparedness of the English troops, 440—change which occurred in the Allies' plan, 441—the English having 439—possessions of the Allies, 442—Russian losses caused by the bombardment, 443—losses of the English troops for the day, 444—the rigidity which characterised the mixed commands of the Allies, 445—embarrassment resulting from the duality of the allied armies, 446—the desire to attack which had resulted, 447—the difference of opinion as to expedient of an assault, 448—the omission of the Allies to push home their advantage becoming one more of the lost occasions, 449—the great resources of the enemy disclosed, 450—the French change their plan, 451—the English Cannonnade of the 19th October, 452—death of Colonel Wood, 453—fall of Captain Peel, 454—cannonnade of the 19th October, 455—the six successive days of cannonnades which followed the 19th October, 456—successes for annihilating the French approaches, 448—representing the Chancery matter, 449 Lord Beaconsfield's suggestion of the working, 450—steps taken by Lord Beaconsfield, 451—a Russian firm dismissed at Tchernovtsi, 451.

SAINT-GERMAIN, NO. PEACE or : strength of the troops about to be engaged, ix. 19—attack and capture of the Bay-head counter-approach, 20—the Cimetière counter-approach, 46.—the Central Section under fire of the French siege-guns, 46.—attack and first capture of the Cimetière, 21—its recapture, 49.—
third capture of the Cimetière counter-approach, 46.—fourth capture of the Work, 46.—fifth attack on the Work, and its recapture by the French, 26—scarcely afterwards taken by the French, 46—attack on the Volokoff tower, 24—the effect on Prince Gorchakov's determination, 46.—his decision, 26—night of the 26th: the Cimetière counter-approach carried by the French, 46—and transformed into a siege-work, 46.—losses on each side, 46.—ground on which the sacrifices made by Tchernier were justified, 26.

Octoberoy campaign, state of Ga., in the beginning of November 1864,
vol. 3.

Debtors' Committee, No. 1000000-
St. Paul, Minn.

Sebastopol front, operations on the Vl. Bl.

Bobastropl. garnierii, announcement of death of Nicholas to, viii. 110.

Библио-Галактика, № 10. Цена 10. 725.

Bebastosel, Western, Ga. No.

2. The following are:

Malley, Lieutenant, v. 81.

Bolin Pease, death of, will be St. Mary's church, Boston Mass., after the English version, the, v. 11, p.

11.

Geographical students, purpose of the, VIII. 45—Formation of the, 67—French sight attack on the, 48, 68, 70, 71, 262; &c. &c. 26, 160 of sq.

Gellert, v. 164.

Gennadios—General, v. 44, 14, 21.

Georgian article, the, of Sievers's plan, vii. 22.

Germar, Gen., v. 162.

Gerwa, L.—petty charges conferred on, vii. 274.

Germany in the field, the test of cultural, &c.—great advantages of England in this respect, &c.—the choice of military commanders by the Government, 5, 22.

Germany, or North Side of Sebastopol, vii. 260 of sq., 264, 27, 47 of sq.—the French objection to attack the, 275, 286; iv. 2, 43, 120, 147, 264, 286; vi. 27 to 27 and 284.

Germany, General Charles of Prussia, v. 264; he is forced by the size of Oasthead, 261.

Germany, Colonel Francis, at the Alma, III. 418 note—of Inkermann, succeeds to the command of the Scots Guards, vi. 22—&c. the cost of the war, &c.—the measure to burn, &c. v. sq.

Germany, Lord, v. 212, 260 of sq., 264, 274.

Germany, Sir Hans von, v. 26—Intention of the German Court, 20, 24, 103, 143.

Germany's importance as far as the dispute regarding the Holy Places, 171—can be overruled in the Case, 266; II. 21-27, 141.

Germany, General, v. 162.

General Lord Raglan's forces, M. 162.

General, v. 16—v. 26.

General, Captain, v. 17 note.

General, V. 106, 113.

General Hill, v. 263 of sq.; vi. 26, 60 of sq., 22 of sq., &c. v. 162, 163 of sq., 211, 237, 244 of sq., 264 of sq., 264 of sq., 266, 267, 268, 266, 271 of sq., 266 of sq., 266 of sq.—engagement between Dickson's guns and the Red-tops on the, 274, 275, 262, 417 and note, 415 of sq.—the position, advances by Armstrong over ground forming part of the, 414, 437, 446—the batteries, 444—Lord Raglan's way of accelerating their withdrawal, 446—his gun bombardment from, 26, 264, 266 and sq.

General's v. 26 note.

General staff, v. 2, 4, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226 and sq.—the charge, 46—defeat and flight of the Russian Legion, 261—his retreat, &c. 221 note, 227, 261.

General, Sergeant-Major, v. 164.

General Tcherny, v. 4 note.

General, Colonel, v. 26, 14—commanded by Lord Raglan, 124.

General, the entrenched camp of, II. 26.

General, Help, L.—attempt for the government of the, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28—history of the war and the case, 26.

General, L. 164, 263, 264.

General Staff, v. 134.

Geno and Genoal. The provision made by the French for the case of the, 16, 120—by the English, &c. 127.

Geno and Genoal, v. 162.

George Barbara, the English, 17th of October of the.

George Barbara, the French, 17th of October, iv. 404.

General, Orders of the Day of the, Long Thackeray's movement on; Monogramme of the 11th of June, in, 274—sent to the French headquarters, 26.—objection to plans involving attack on the Great Redan, 275—more especially if the negotiations were not to be renewed, &c.—assaults on the Redan from a distance out of harmony with the new French design, 274, 275-281.

George gas ammunition, consumption of, viii. 21.

George or Barbara, from the winter of Barbara to middle of the spring February. The name will be referred to what might prove a long siege, &c. i. the time of Barbara now passing upon their energies, &c.—the defensive works, &c.—the designs of the French still pointing to the Pegstaff bastion, &c.—obliged to cover the French by the 27th orders, they resort to redoubts, 16.—part taken at this time by the King of in the work of the siege, 7—the great strain put up by the 26th, &c.—on the English conferred on the enemy by giving him time, &c.—Tolstoi's division, 11—his measures for covering a wall, 10—petty sorties, 17—moral superiority of the Russians in their position, 14.—indignation of French army, 18—&c. many encountering our guards of the trenches, 26—departure of Prince Napoleon, 26.—natural reluctance of the French to alter their main plan of siege, 11—&c. returns often to Lord Raglan—then their attitude respecting to the division of the 'three,' 27—envoy sent by Lord Raglan to the French headquarters, &c.—French plan approved by Lord Raglan, &c.—partial change of plan, 24—French among operations, 26—Tolstoi's skill and power in the science of war, 24—progress of mining and countermining operations, &c.—Incyper's camp shifting from Pegstaff Bastion to Malakoff, 27—Garderobe resolve to operate against the Malakoff, 26—predicted attack on the Malakoff,

46.—French monnaies, 40—result of conflict from Nov. 4, 1834 to a truce of Feb., 48—questions raised by oriental cities, 45

—days of Sebastopol from mid-July of Feb. 1855 to second week of April 56 at sea—Journal of Phil. Feb., 56—Todleben's inferences from what the
A. V. L. been visibility doing 45—
L. took redoubt L. 57—French L. on it, 58—false report of made to Cambronne, 72—the Vol-L. 73—French L. 74—
e shots of French L. 75—believe th. is concentrate assaulted, 75, 77—Garnet's en-ments, 78—arrival of young Grand Duke Nicholas and Michael 79—the Mamelon th. 80—
the Kamtschatka Lunette, ib.— Todleben's armament of it, 82—Garnet's reason for declining to seize the Mamelon, 84—his determination to sustain from assaulting the Lunette, 84—advance of French "approches" Aga. 84, 85, 88—sorties executed against the English siege-works, 91—Col. Kelly's Japanese —Bozhestoff's attack, ib.—charge by Yvars, joined by Kelly and Gordon, 95—Col. Kelly wounded and taken prisoner, 98—attack under Astapoff, 99—fight at Mortar Battery, 100—Heuleff's surprise of advanced for a while in two advanced batteries 102—comments on great sorties effected against the French, 104—extension given by Todleben to his counter-approaches, 109—siege operations against the Redan and its neighbour, 109—arrival of Oude Pasha, 109—making of Russian art. ps, 109—Prince M. Gortchakoff appointed commander, 110—Admiral Isbrunne killed, 111—departure of Sir John Borrows, 112—preparations for a great canonade, 114.

Secret terms of mission entrusted to General Niel, 116 et seq.—General Niel's opinions on the Crimean war, 117—his 'mission,' 118—but position at French headquarters, 119—March, 122—French Emperor's plan rejected from the English, 123—disloyalty of the second corps, 125.

The April bombardment, 133 et seq.—preparation for the examination, 135—counter-preparations by the Russians, 136—opening and continuation of bombardment, 138—incompetence of some English preparations, 144—order given to Captain

• Oldham, 145—advanced No. VII—battery completed, 14—enemy's way of dealing with an advanced battery, 148—advanced No. VIII., 143—General Graham, 144—losses sustained by Oldham's battery, 160—General Buonaparte, 171—Sir General Graham's Judgment of Oldham's battery, 172—General No. V—battle of, 16—simultaneous engagement of No. VIII. battery, 178—losses of the Allies in artillery service, 187—the defenders of Sebastopol, 188—the fort works needed for Sevastopol, 184—heroism of their defense at this time, 185—the two White Guards crushed and silenced, 186—the Malakoff covered by counter-approaches, 188—the Knobehorn Lunette brought to ruin, 18—failure of English batteries against the Great Wall, 190—failure of the English at Fort Bastion, 191—great effort made to repair it, 193—its peril, 19—desolation of general bombardment, 194—Tolstoy's Inquiry, 195.

Stage of Salvation, from April 8 to the 11 of May, 1860 of sq.—Bisot mortally wounded, 16.—succesed by Mcl, 202—Todtboen's encachement in front of Central Bastion, 306—Pellissier fights for the Olonne
L...—Todtboen's project to capture the fortifications of the city, 310—Todtboen and the army of the South, 314—his death, 214—praises bestowed by the army of the South, 314—Todtboen caused our people, 314—on their return to France, 314—Todtboen's meeting with Verne, 217—the Eupatoria table, 16—accension of 15,000 German troops, 16.

Troubled moments of the French, 212—conference of 11th April, 213—Guerrobert's state of mind, 234—conduct and bearing of Nel, 215—agreement between Guerrobert and Lord Raglan, 216—warlike impetuosity of French army, 223—preliminary conference, 224—French General Lebrun assault of Paris, 225—Lord Raglan resolved to put off assault, 232—interview between Nel and Lord Raglan, 233—course taken by Lord Raglan, 234—uncertainty as to duration of postponement, 235

Actively perturbing Interference of Louis Napoleon in the war for Schleswig, 211 et seq.—Napoleon's Visit to England, 298—Council of War at Copenhagen, 211—the Emperor's plan of campaign, 214—general part of plan, 216—the Emperor does his best to get rid of sailors to the

Crimea, 247—his letter of instruction to Canrobert, 46.—the Generals in the Crimea acquainted with the Imperial plan, 250—trial base on which it all rested, 252

Interposition of French Emperor continuing and bringing about the war, 253; influence of T. A. de—project for opening a passage into the Sea of Azof, 254—the Peninsula of Kerch 256—Baron Wrangel there in command, 16.—eagerness of English to have the attack set on foot, 260—Canrobert's defens to Lord Raglan, 261—sailing of expedition, 262—the Submarine Cable, 263—telegrams from Paris, 264—courses taken by Lord Raglan, 264—intitute given to Sir George Brown, 270—return of expedition, 274—Canrobert's account of the recall, 278—letter from French Emperor, 279.

The Emperor's dictation resisted, 280—copies of his plan, and verification of Canrobert, 283 et seq.—Pélissier's letter of May 4, 285—his growing discontent, 288—expositions of Emperor's plan, 289—the three chief commanders in conference, 290—agreement as to plan of field operations, 291—Canrobert and Omar Pacha refuse to guard English trenches, 292—rejection of plan, 293—Canrobert's endeavours to rid himself of command, 296—his resignation tendered, 297—his command transferred to Pélissier, 298—falling of French army towards him, 301.

BESSOP OPERATIONS commence; the French sapping more closely up to the works in the Karabekuya, ix 270—and preparing to establish new batteries on ground commanding the Roadstead, 46.—the English strengthening their hold of ground captured by Rye, 46.—had afterwards handing it over to the charge of the French, 271—continuation of the mining and countermining operations, 46.—the moral effect attributed by the Russians to their vigorous countermining, 46.

Black Park, vi. 214-6.

Bistritz, i. 44, 46; ii. 192, 193, 195—usage of, 214 et seq., 264, 265, 266, 267, 281, 282, 283.

Billary, Major, vii. 132, 134 and note, 271.

Bosphorus, ii. 363; iii. 12; iv. 19, 20, 142 note, 191, 224; vi. 20, 25, 134.

Spears, General James, appointment of, vii. 365—his instructions, 42.—his report, 366—his course of action, 42.

Lord Panmure's adoption of the report, 207—announces the death of Lord Raglan to the British army, ix. 260—he sentily int the death of Lord Raglan, 260—he chooses Lord Raglan as a guide, 261.

Simpson, Lieutenant, vi. April 1867—bombardment, vii. 185, 186, 272.

Sinclair, Lieutenant, vi. 374, 377, 400.

Sisopo, the disaster in, ii. 13 et seq.—decision of the English Cabinet to regard to, 21, 24, 25, 190.

Sims, Captain, vi. 158.

Sivache, the near waters of the, iii. 94.

Sir Walter Scott, vi. 26 et seq., 12, 168—one of the early defenders of Sebastopol, 211.

Sleeping Cabinet, the, ii. 309, 306, 309.

Smith, Captain Hugh, iv. 28; vi. 266.

Smith, Dr Andrew, vii. 19, 186, 188, 277, 404, 438, 479.

Smith, Dr Fowle, ix. 266.

Smith, Mr Jervoise, vii. 264.

Smith, Mr Orwald, vi. 262.

Smith, Private John, v. 266 note.

Somnus [sic] W. ... = 262.

Sosyrna, vi. 131—improved hospital established at, 304.

Smyth, Colonel Henry, vi. 30 note, 207 note, 234.

Snakoff, Colonel, vi. 182.

Solomonoff, General, ii. 212, 213; vi. 29 et seq., 29 et seq.—his force, 36, 35, 38—at battle of Inkermann, 39 et seq., 91, 94 note, 104, 106 et seq., 112 et seq., 114, 117 et seq., 127, 128, 130, 152, 154—his guns, 161, 163, 370—his artillery falls sick, 446, 461, 464, 467—what if he had ascended the Inkerman heights by the Victoria Ridge? 477, 480—his enterprise, 486.

Soldier's nature, the mystery of the, vii. 472.

Soldiers, sickness and failing strength of, in winter, i. 133.

Somers, Lord, vi. 261 note.

Somerset, Colonel, charger named, vi. 329, x. 268.

Sorites, Russian petty, viii. 37.

Soujuk-Kale, attack on, recommended, vi. 26 et seq.; vi. 26.

Southward's narrative, i. p. 172.

Spirka, Cossack general, the, selected by Potemkin, 174, 175 et seq.—captured in place of the general and not a Frenchman, 214, 220—counter guard carrying of by Potemkin, 214, vi. 22.

Spirka, General, vi. 12, 264.

Spirka, General, vi. 12, 265, 267.

Spirka, General, vi. 12, 266, 267, 268, 269 et seq.

'Spanish marriage', the, ii. 366 note.

Sparks, Lieutenant, v. 234, 267.

Spares, Dr, vii. 643 note.

Speaker, Lord, vi. 26 et seq.

Speaker, General, vi. Kertch expedition, viii. 269, 274.

Spurz, the, vi. 24.

Staff at Headquarters, vii. 20.

Bastard, Sir Richard.
 Basque coast—siege to the 57th Regt., ibid. 176; 177 note,
 178 note.

Stanley, Captain Edward, v. 20 note,
 207, 209, 204, 205 note.

Stanley, Dame, work on the Greek Church, i. 54 note—on Russia and her church, 216 note—on the Greek church, iv. 104 note—on dogma, v.
 10 note.

Stanley, Mrs., vii. 304—her life by her brother, Dean Stanley, referred to, 479 note—her experiences, 361—her heroic devotion to the sick, 362.

Stanley, Lord, of Alderley, v. 22 note,
 230 note.

Stanley, Sir Henry, the African missionary, viii. 446 note.

Stannovitch, Admiral, lv. 76.

Stanton, Captain, v. 57 note.

Star Fort, the, iii. 207 note, 207—advantages of an attack on the, 204, 206, —forces available for the defence of,
 203—Sir John Mervyn on the, 206
 note, 205, 204 of seq., 206, 205 note;
iv. 10. 44. 45 of seq. v. 114. 113, 120, 127, 221.

Stasie, Colonel, ii. 311. 304; ii. 207
 note, 224, 200; iv. 204, 205; v. 48;
ii. 207.

Scotting, H. 332.

Scotting, General, iv. 204 note—his labours, i. 17 note, 18.

Schleswig-Holstein, iv. 148 note, 150.

Schwein, Cosmo, his Orkney Campaign with the Connaught Rangers, quoted, viii. 446 note.

Scoyne, Lieutenant, iv. 200.

Scoyne, A. G.—ret. Scoyne, ii. 44. 302.

Scott, Captain, v. 27 note, 204.

Stirling, Lieutenant, v. 100.

Stocks, Captain, v. 100.

Stockwell, ii. 152.

Stokes, John, v. 204.

Scopford, Admiral, iv. 207 note, 205 note; Lieutenant, vii. 48.

Stow, Captain, v. 48.

Stratford, the vii. 204—money's advance to guard, 205.

Stratford v. 174.

Stratford General, mortally wounded
ii. 207.

Stratford a Frenchman, i. 207.

Stratford de Redi, the Lady, vii. 204.

Stratford de Redi, Mr. Lord, was Sir Stratford Dealing.

Straton, v. 128.

Stretton, Major, v. 142.

Stretton Bay, iv. 204; v. 8, 22.

Stewart, Major General, v. 105 note—his success obtained by, 106.

Sturt, Major, v. 204.

Subayana, the, viii. 204, 205— telegrams by, 204 of seq. 205.

Subayana fight, ii. 202.

Suffrage, the, of the Greeks during the winter, vii. 104 of seq.

Sufja Khan, v. 204.

Suhrawardi, Chaharbagh, v. 204.

Sultana, the administration of foreign affairs under, i. 11. Mameluk's objection to turn a single 'or the defence of the, ii. 172. the French Government oppose the, 142.

Sultana, alias of the, ii. 207.

Sultana-Pha, v. 43 of seq.

Sutherland, v. 117.

Sutherland, Dr. vii. 204.

Sutherland Hilltop—sic! Durness.

Swarzoff, iv. 120; v. 48.

Sutherland Battery, iv. 43 of seq.

Swallow, Lieutenant, v. 204.

Swallow, Lieutenant, v. 100.

Swinton's battery, v. 40 note.

Swedes dominated by sailors, v. 200
 206.

Swynn, General, v. 20 note, 204, 206,
 205, 206, 207.

Symonds, Captain, iv. 204.

Sykes was Mr Arthur the 'Minstrel of Law Making' referred to, iv. 413 note.

Synona, George, v. 276.

Syria, French influence in, i. 20.

Taganrog, ii. 44—operations at, 44 of seq.—its defence, 45 note.

Tegilla, v. 271.

Telford sword, v. 203 note.

Tikki, Cape, ii. 40 of seq.

Tolstoi, Tolstoi, i. 200 of seq.

Tolstoy campaign, the, vii. 204, 205.

Talbot Colonel, ii. 207.

Tarhan Lagoon, ii. 204, 207; iv. 20.

Tarutino battle scene, v. 111 of seq. 202.

Target or target, designation of, in the English Headquarters, v. 204, 207.

Tarzak, the, v. 201. ii. 203.

Tatham, Captain, i. 120 note; ii. 200;
v. 21.

Tatham, Captain, R.N., instructed to stop a storm off St. Helena, v. 202.

Taurian peninsula, the, vii. 176.

Taylor, Harry, v. 204.

Taylor, James, gunner, v. 202.

Taylor, Lieutenant, v. 204.

Taylor, Mr Cleveland, v. 204.

Taylor, Mr Hartwell, v. 204.

Tepelinsky, v. 203 note.

Tepeh Dog, vii. 1—proposal movement of troops by the, viii. 204; ii.
11. 111.

Teheran River, the, ii. 7, 20 of seq.
 20, 21 of seq. 21, v. 8, 20, 20, 21 note, 21, 21, 204; ii. 20 of seq.
 —occupation by the Allies of front ground towards the, ii. 20, 21, 203, 20, 202.

Teheran, the valley of the, ii. 204,
 205, iv. 21 of seq. 205, 204 of seq.—
 Lord Curzon ordered to protect the 205, 206, 207; v. 20, 203; v. 204, 205.

100, 104, 106, 170 note, 200; vi. 100 note; ix. 10.

Trabuegoff, i. 140 note.

Tchernigov, v. 260; v. 26, 24, 48 of sq., 51, 61, 270 note, 200, vi. 14, 20 note. Tchernigov Bridge, the, ix. 62—appearances of Russians on, 62.

Telegraph Battery, ix. 164, 165 of sq.

Telegraph Battery, the, also 'Zaritschayev.'

Telegraph Height, iii. 8 of sq.—part of exposed to fire of ships, iii. 16, 16, 81—the batteries on the, 44, 46, 56, 67, 68, 69, 71, 81, 102 of sq., 172, 200—the French work on the, 200.

Telegraph Hill, ix. 83, vi. 87.

Telegraph, examining, examining the batteries and fortifications, viii. 247.

Tenguta, Bishop, vi. 230, 272.

Tenguta Guards, Mountain, v. 100.

Tenoch, ii. 202.

Tents, the Army is supplying, to the army, vi. 88.

Terterov, W. H., v. 100 note.

Thessaloniki, Captain, vi. 264, 265.

Thessaloniki, Russian, ix. 200.

Theatre Square, iv. 262 of sq., 291 of sq.

Theodosia, landing-place near, vii. 200—troops at, 200; ix. 48.

Thessaloniki, the naval hospital at, vii. 200—word Thessaloniki at, viii. 40.

There, iii. 1, 204; vi. 204.

Third Fleet at, ix. 107, 108, 109.

Thompson, J. P., his winter care of the wounded, ii. 147 of sq.

Thompson, Lieutenant, v. 200.

Thompson, Captain, iii. 20.

Thomas, Lieutenant, v. 200, 200.

Thomas, Lieutenant, vi. 20.

The Tolstoi, Administration, vi. 201.

Thornton's mission to, 214 and 242; the debates on, vii. 401 note.

Thru, x. 204.

'Three' Pond, the, vii. 200 of sq.

'Three' the 12th corps of, ii. 200 of sq., vii. 204, 211, 212, 214.

Thomson, Mr., consultation with the other on playing chess by Peterkin ix. 150.

Timofejeff General, vi. 20 note, 21—his birth, 20—his education, 20—service, 200, ix. 20, 1-2 note.

Timofejeff, M., at Vienna Conference, viii. 215.

Tolstoev, General, 'Defense de Sebastopol,' iii. 247 note, 248 note, 250 note, 261 of sq., 262 note, ix. 20 note, 21 note, 22 note, 23 note, 24, 25—his role to the battle-field of Aksa, 25—his meeting with Peterkin ix. 25—he surveys the ground around Sebastopol, 70—his report of the survey, 70—his character, training, and services, 107—in recommended by Monteville to quit the Crimea, 121—his return and defend Sebastopol, 10, 114, 117, 124—his opinion of an attempt to turn the Zembla Head, 120—plan of defense, 120—to jettison in ordering the fleet to be dismantled, and applying to resources to the defense of Sebastopol, 127—his plan for strengthening the defense, 128—the two ways in which his works might produce a result, 128—his way of adjusting the labour, 142, 144 note—his opinion of the reconnaissance of the Allies, 146 note—on the strength of the line of work, 146—his great exertions in preparing entrenchments, 144, 200, 201 note, 166 note, 200 note, 200 note—the opinion of the defensive resources of Sebastopol, 144 note of sq., 141—on the importance of certain locations, 200—on the strength of the gun crews, 200, 200, 200—he prescribes on the defense, 200—his distribution of batteries along the line, 200, 200, 217, 202, 216, 220, 206, 271—on the strength of the Allies in案—viii. 200 note, 200 note, 200 note—on the French work, 200—he surveys the Bidian, 218—on the proposed assault of Sebastopol, 200—he makes the preparations of the French, 200—his defense of the place, 200, 201—x. 20—on the British lines of defense at Malakovo, 20 of sq., 20 note—on the Roman road at Belogorievka, 207 note—the plan, 200—on the light Cavalry charge, 207 note, 200 note, 207 note, 200 note—on the strength of the Ottoman army before Inkermann, vi. 2 note, v. 2, 14 note, 20 note of sq., 20—his opinion on the action of the Russian artillery on Shell Hill, 27 note, 20—on Hamley's firing, 104 note, 100 note, 418—his frustration of Colonel Widdly's enterprise, 400, 412, 491 note; vii. 207—that resources of, vii. 2—defense of Sebastopol by ii. 20 of sq.—counter-operations on Mount Inkermann, 64 of sq.—plan of, in military operations, 20—his recommendations, 24—on effects of April bombardment, 104—on failure to follow up assault, 40—his perplexity as to this failure, 104, 204, 201—his new defense, ix. 18—his program, 27, 18, 21, 22, 24—on the line of the allied batteries, 27, 100, 204 of sq., 112, 113, 114, 194 note—he repels the Malakoff, 118, 114—his victory, 170—on the Russian fire from the Bidian, 100—on the Russian loss on 10th June, 20, 200—on Peterkin's failure, 219—wounded, 202—and removed from Sebastopol, 10, 202—but approaching defeat in the Dard, 200, 201—his victory at Inkermann, 207—his 'conscience in this', 20, 204, 200

227—the ruins of his defences, 192—on the 'harrow and ruin' of the English Army, 210—his erroneous statement regarding General Rybn's conquest, 213.

Fondlinson, Captain, v. 192.

Footisk regiment, the, vi. 91, 111.

Forrest, General, ii. 37 note his forces, 304—strength of his brigade, vi. 24 note, 227, 231, 233—charge of 400 men under him 234, 250—apointed military commissioner at Paris, ix.
249.

Forraine, Lieutenant, in April Bombardment, viii. 11, 179.

Foucault's guns, vi. 204 of sqq.

Fraser, Thomas (Crimean Army Fund),
vi. 243 of sqq.—Lord Raglan's high praise of his and Egerton's services, 233.

Town front of Sebastopol, preceding operations against, vi. 15—effect of April bombardment on, 119

Townsend, iii. 37 note—battery, vi. 45 114—aliance of, 142—three of the guns left exposed to the power of the Russian guns, 174—two guns left in position on or the houses, 134—his guns, 140—final peace, vi. 205.

France, i. 319.

French Bridge, the, iv. 7, 20 of sqq.; vi.
23, 24, 25.

French road, v. 74 of sqq.

Transport Office, vii. 20, 38, 45 of sqq.

Transport, the means of, decking, vii.
100.

Treasury, the, vii. 37 of sqq.

Treaties of 1846 and 1843 and the maintenance of the Sultan's dominion, i.
21 note.

Tremayne, Captain, v. 220.

Trevallyn, Lieutenant, v. 237, 277.

Trevarez, a Charles, naval & secretary of the Treasury, vi. 23, 24, 117, 130, 199, 403, 472, 473.

Troad, the, i. 363.

Trotter, Colonel, ii. 191, 192, 193, 194—
calls on Lord Raglan, 196 of sqq., 253,
260, 267, 282, 283, 312, 314, 324; iii.
20, 21, 226, 306; iv. 37—on the development of British Infantry, 200
note, 272 note, 284 note.

Trottsky, Capt., vi. 28.

Trottsky, Lieutenant, iv. 200.

Trottsky Peak, vi. 66 of sqq.

Trottsky Ravine, the, ix. 96.

Trotlopp, Colonel, viii. 218 note.

Troops, number of, before Sebastopol,
vii. 176, 246.

Trophy, the attempt to annex an English, ii. 213 note.

Troubridge, Sir Thomas, iii. 200 note,
212; vi. 50 note, 61 note.

Troy, Joseph, vi. 241, 272, 274 of sqq.

Troyon, Lieut., vi. 218 note—his milestone, 207 note— conspicuous exploit of, earning him the high praise of Cavour as well as Lord Raglan,

vi. 1, 15.

Tulloch, Colonel, and Sir John McNeill on the road question, vii. 284, 321 424 of sqq.—their animadversions on others, 471 of sqq.—Tulloch considered a hero by the country, 227.

Turkey, the Czar prepares to invade, ii.
20—Russian invasion of, 181—share of, in causing the war, 181.

Turkey, power of, i. 18—the inhabitants of 18—Russian longing for, 21 —grounds for foreign interference in, 114.

Turkish empire, saying of Europe in reference to the, i. 32.

Turkish Ministry, change of, i. 179.

Turkish reinforcements, Chosroff's desire to obtain, viii. 77, 78.

Turner, Captain, iii. 16; vi. 200, 201.

Turner, John, vi. 156.

Turner, Lieutenant, vi. 200.

Turke's, v. 174, 274 of sqq.

Turke's, Captain John, battery 16
192, 193, 244 and note, 278; v. 276 note, vi. 20 note, 141, 144—the effective fire, 193, 116, 229; viii. 224 note.

Tuzla, ii. 104.

'Java's Apostle' Battery, iv. 48 of sqq., 79.

Tylden, Captain, viii. 214 note.

Tylden, General, in night attack on Woronoff Ridge, viii. 28, 160; ix.
100, 115, 116 of sqq., 171—intensity of the fire confronted by him, 171—he is quickly struck down, 6.

Tynrell, James, vi. 450.

Ulema, the corps of the, i. 272.

'Ulamah,' the, ii. 2.

Ulukul Akles, iii. 8, 14 of sqq., 43, 50.

Ulukul Tioneta, iii. 8, 10, 64.

Unkne Blidet, the treaty of, i. 28, 70
note.

Upton, Colonel, vi. 200—his attempt to close the 'Gap,' 207, 214, 224, 226
note.

Urosev, vi. 418 note, 442 note.

Usage, the, which tends to protect the weak against the strong, i. 22—instance of a wrong to which the usage did not apply, 24—instances in which the usage was applicable and was disobeyed, 46.—instances in which the usage was faithfully obeyed by Austria, Russia, and England, 56 of sqq.—the practical working of, 20.

Urbridge, Lord, v. 96 note, 114 note.

Vallet, Marshal, ii. 186—order for assembling troops near Constantinople by, viii. 172, 237, 238, 244, 304, 305, 347, 350, 394—the French Minister of War, ix. 14, 27—his correspondence with Palmer, 26 of sqq., 26, 226—the power he exerted over the Empress, 242—success of his efforts to prevent a rebellion, 243—his efforts to pacify Niel, 24.

Valquier's battalion, vi. 264, 265.

Valorous, the war-ship, vii. 51.

Vane, Lieutenant, vi. 41 note.

Vane, H. 21, 123, 125, 127, 128, 129, 202, 203, 209—the Allies at, 231, 236 et seq., 244, 253, 261, 263, 274—Great, 201—troops and supplies left at, 204, 212, 247, 276; v. 260, vi. 20, 21, 23, 434 note.

Vansbee, H. 21, 128.

Vaudrey, L. 277.

Vaughan, Lieutenant, iv. 671, vi. 694, 699, 704, 705, 707.

Véloce, the French steamer, viii. 61, 64.

Vernonhoyle (Guards), v. 77; vi. 244, 274.

Vessey, L. 242.

Viaduct, the, vi. 21.

Vialla, vi. 251, 308 note, 404, 415 note.

Vicars, Captain Hedley opposes Bonapartist attack at Wroclaw River, viii. 24—charge by, 26—death of, 26.

Vice, L. 201.

Victoria Bridge, the, i. 126.

Victoria Park, H. 155.

Victoria Regia, v. 2, 2 notes, vi. 7 et seq., 37, 38, 61, 75, 83, 85, 408 note, 421, 449, 470, 477 et seq.—defence of, vii. 29, vi. 26, 104, 107, 124.

Victory, the Russian prouer fr., H. 266 and note, 264.

* Victoria 'Office, the, vii. 20, 21, 41 et seq.

Vienna Conference, the, i. 230.

Vienna Note, the, with the proposed Turkish modifications, i. 270.

* Vienna Note, the, i. 370—its acceptance by the powers and Russia, 371—Lord Stratford's opinion of, 374—the Turkish Government determines to reject it unless altered, 376—the text of the Note, and of the alterations suggested by the Turks, vi. note and appendix, 380, 381.

Vienna, peace negotiations at, vii. 819—debates in Conference, 820 et seq.—failure of negotiations, 828—Austrian proposals at, 835 et seq.—speeches at closing of, 847.

Vieyna, L. 244—his mutilation of the drums of the national Guard 240.

Vigilance, the English soldier's work of, v. 49.

Vilebain, General, vi. 122, 471.

Villiers, the Right Hon. Charles Pelham, vii. 274.

Vinch, Captain, iv. 124.

Vinoy, General, v. 71, 270—position of his brigade before Inkermann, vi. 15, 18, 29, 47; vii. 268.

* Violet Fans' quoted, vii. 290 and note.

Viper, the gunboat, viii. 61, 64.

Vistet, M., i. 264 note.

Vivandiers, the, ix. 107.

Vinter, the Grand, on Prince Metternich's mission, i. 110—his communication to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, 124—consults Lord Stratford, 154.

Vladimir steam-ship, vi. 76.

Voirol, General, i. 227—despatch of, 229 note.

Volyntsi Redoubt, formation of the, vii. 73 ii. 24, 100 et seq.

Volkovod Tower, the, iv. 61 et seq., 204 note; ii. 24, 26.

Volyvia gorge, the, v. 372; vi. 72.

Volyvia ravine, the, vi. 112.

Von Roon, H. 247 note.

Wahrsperg, L. 200.

Waddy's, Colonial, enterprise, vi. 446, 450.

Wagnon, Lieutenant, v. 17 note.

Wagram campaign, the, vii. 68, 69 note, 417.

Walcheren Disaster, the, vii. 403.

Walcheren expedition, the, vii. 411 et seq.

Walcott, Captain, commands No. VIII battery, vii. 176—thair ineffective fire, 178—Lord Raglan's high praise to, 180, 372.

Walwick, Count, his interview with Lord Aberdeen and Lord Clarendon, ii. 7, p.—General of War, vii. 262.

Walker, Colonel, iii. 90; vi. 184, 189, 191—he orders the Scots Fusiliers to charge, 193, 194—his two first wounds, 197; his third wound, 49—he gives over his command to General Seymour, 201; vii. 445 note.

Walker, Lieutenant, vii. 214 note.

Walker, Major, vi. 144, 149 note.

Walker, Charles, Sergeant, vi. 249.

Walker, A. C. 21, 247 on petition of, by Russia, ii. 29, 44, 53, 108, 216.

Wallis, Captain, iii. 184.

Walsham, H. 279.

War administration of Raglan, the, vii. 11, 12, 14, 21—standing compromise between the Horse Guards and the Government, 26, 27, 28—the victualling and the transport sub-departments of the Admiralty, 28—the Army Medical Service, 28—the Commissariat, 23, 26—the old army officers without experience derived from recent campaigns, 28—the Dukes of Newcastle, Secretary of State for War, ii. 29—his capacity as a war administrator, 40, 41—the way in which our dispersed system of war administration proved beneficial, 46, 47, 48, 49—our system of war administration at the time of the great war with France, 40, 49—the Wellington era, 62, 66, v. 72—the business of War administration compressed, 74, 75—1816, 76, 77, 78, 80—long protracted continuance of the enveloping policy, 63—result of the inquiry, 76.

War administration of France, the, vii. 6 et seq.

Wardes, iii. 134.

War Department, the, vii. 48—in department in 1793, 51—one formed in 1794, 6. —in 181 there is a Department of War and Colonies, 13.

War Department, papers relating to the health of the army and the care of the sick presented to the, by the Sebastopol Committee, vii. 272.

Wardlaw, Major, ii. 146, v. 146.

War English declaration of, ii. 219.

Warlike impatience of French army, shallowness of, viii. 226.

‘War Office,’ the, vii. 13, 22.

Warra, Colonel, ix. 177 et seq.

Warren, Colonel, ii. 98, 102, 200; vi. 522, 523, 524 et seq., 525 note, 526 note.

Warren, Lieutenant, iii. 90; vi. 231.

Waratipa, Hauhau, the destruction of, at Kerikeri, ix. 346 note.

War—the mechanics of, the light the naval attack on Sebastopol thrown on, iv. 418, 419.

Wasp Tower, iv. 264, 265 et seq.

Watson, iii. 218.

Waure, iii. 147.

Waure, Miss, vii. 417 note.

Webb, Captain, v. 144, 228, 230, 237.

Webber Smith, Colonel, ii. 134.

Wehr, Lieutenant, v. 117.

Wellasley, Sir Arthur (1800), vii. 400 note.

Wellington, the Duke of, in France, i. 22—his foreign policy, 28 note—his conference with Nicholas L. 78, 236—his interview with the Secretary of State, ii. 271 note—and the defense of London, vii. 401 note, 402 note, 421 note, 422 note.

Wellington on, the, vii. 48—the Wellington signs, 48—its brief duration, ib. 78.

Well-way, the, vi. 48 et seq., 107 et seq., 108 et seq., 117.

‘West Ch.’, iii. 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16.

West Ind., vi. 47.

West, Lord, Colonel, vi. 104, 105, 200, 214 note, 216—his errors of action, 216; ix. 250—overseas Sir John Campbell, 179, 179—his reluctance to believe that he was powerless to execute an attack, 179—his off-the-and direction to General Graham, 180—the sole means at his disposal, 181—his vain efforts, 182—the communications that passed between him and his commander, Sir George Brown, 182.

Westmoreland, Lady, vii. 447 note, 448 note.

Westmoreland, Lord, instructions to, ii. 116—at Vienna Conference, viii. 212.

West Register's Book, vi. 444 et seq.

West Dutch, the, at Sebastopol, viii. 61, 67.

Wetherall, vi. 447 note.

Wetherall Captain, ii. 203; v. 73 note; vii. 144, 200, 204.

Wetherall, G. A., Adjutant-General, ix. 291.

Wetherall, Major, iv. 8 note, 18.

Wheatcroft, Lieutenant, v. 204.

Whisper, iii. 70.

White Redoubt, the two, acquisition of, viii. 79—crushed and silenced, 100—assault of, just followed up, &c.—spikes repaired, &c.; ib. 90, 91, 92, 100 et seq., 111.

White, Captain Robert, v. 200, 201, 204, 207.

‘White Tower,’ the, iv. 171 note, 177.

Widdin, i. 44, 45.

Wilbraham, Colonel, vi. 204.

Wilkins, Richard, vi. 242, 278 note.

Willm, Captain, vi. 201.

Williams, Captain, v. 118, 119.

Williams, Mr George, ii. 67.

Williamson, Captain, vii. 236 note.

Willis, Captain, vi. 138, 141.

Wilson, Captain (Gardiner's Guards), vi. 204, 205, 207 note, 207.

Wilson, Dr. P. H. (Hawke), vi. 204 note.

Wilson, John, Officer, v. 217.

Wilson, Private, vi. 201.

Wimble, Colonel, vi. 404 note.

Wimpole, Colonel, vi. 201, 202, 203, 204, 205; vii. 400 note—his brigade to 100.

Windham Colonel, iv. 38; vi. 27 note, 204—despatch, 200 note, 207 note.

Windmill Heights, vi. 20.

Windmill, the, vi. 45 et seq., 48 et seq., 56, 78, 104, 105, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212.

Windmill Bridge, the, vi. 20.

Windsor Castle, Council of War at, viii. 242.

Wing, ii. 100.

Winter campaign, problem solved by the memory of the, vi. 200.

Winter, Captain, v. 200, 201, 207.

Winter to the Crimea during 1854-55, vii. 160.

Winter Trenches, the: determination of the Allies to winter on the Chersonese Heights, vi. 9—shaky entrenched position, 9—the resources of the country entirely at the command of the enemy, 1—the Allied armies wholly dependent upon supplies brought by sea, 10—the French system of war administration, 6—the English system of military administration as existing before the quarrel with Russia, 11—the Ministry of War and Colonies, 12—the War Office, 13—causes which prevented England from having a real-

War Department, 34—the Home Office, 34—a standing committee between the Duke's party and the Government, 34—accident as product of the failure of men in the general effect of the standing compromise, 35—the Ordnance, 35—the Victualling and the Transport sub-departments of the Admiralty, 35—the Army Medical service, 35—the Commissariat, 35—Sir Charles Trevelyan's proposed creation of a Commissariat force for foreign services, 35—Influence, power, and status of a Commissariat force as amounting to an English army in the field, 35—the old way of doing things derived from recent experience and changes made in our system of war administration, 35—the Duke of Newcastle Secretary of State for War, 35—the authority he exercised in general conduct of the old army, others not under his guidance, 35—want of official machinery at the disposal of the Duke of Newcastle, 35—especially as a war administrator, 35—further changes made in the administrative machinery on the way to war in which the Duke is said to have performed the task of war administration, 35—the way a word can disarrange a system of war administration goes without saying, 35—England's practice of forgoing the old—her former officers and administrators to keep up the general system of the old—large towns open the ‘regimental’ system, 35—no good service at least our allies had rendered they had option to pull down our Quarters, thus breaking ‘parliament’ with the glory of the old—gave not courage to their men, their traditions, their colours, 35.

Our system of war administration at the time of the great conflict with France, 35.

The way in which France and England ministered to their armies in the first two winters under which the supply of the Allied armies proceeded, 36—the failure of the Russian campaign in their bearing upon the condition of men, 36—the arrangements by which France and England as best conducted to supply their troops in the field, 36—the change of conditions to which they were subsequently subject, 36—the magnitudes of their task, 36—other difficulties and difficulties added by continuing the activity of provision unassisted by persons and the want of supplies, 36—thus it may of course have been, but no one can say if necessary, the continuance to the Russians, 36—360 ton of supplies to the rest of the forces at sea and army posts affected, 36—the result of the state of power, to the winter upon the supply of both meat and vegetables, 36—the British ships of supply, 36—as affected by the French, 36—by the English, 36—extreme narrowness of the communication through Balaklava, 36—construction of wharves at Balaklava, 36—roadway between camp and port, 36—question of ‘metalling’ a road before the 17th October, 36—question of ‘metalling’ a road after the 17th of October, 36—Lord Raglan's measures with respect to the road by the Col, 36—main effort made to ‘metall’ 36—was importance of having a ‘metalled’ road, 36—question as to how the peril occasioned by the breaking up of the roads would have been met, 36—the road between port and camp becoming almost impassable, 36—the cause of and transport during, 36—cause of the stop of transports to England in May 1855—the winter there commenced, 36—constitution of the Treasury, 37—the incidents of blizzards, 37—state of the Allied armies before the hurricanes, 37—the food of the French army, 37—the food provided for the English army, 37—the shelter provided for the French army, 37—for the English, 37—Lord Raglan's measures for bedding the troops, 38—warm clothing, 38—provision made by the French for the care of their sick and wounded, 38—by the Russians, 38—insufficiency of their preparations for the care of the sick and wounded, 37—undue amount of work that performs was cast upon the English soldiery, 39—their state of health, 39—the expense of the 1st of November, 39—Lord Raglan's views of the disease, 39—his measures, 39—lasting effect of the hurricanes upon the condition of our troops, 39.

The sufferings of the armies during the winter, 39—sufferings of the Russian army, 39—sufferings of the allied armies, 39—general characterisation of the winter of 1854-55 in the north-west of the Crimea, 39—end of the state of the garrison in the Chersonese, 39—the evils inseparable from an attempt to winter the Allied armies without due preparation, 39—the misery experienced by over the 100,000 men, 39—the suffering and losses sustained by the French army, 39—shelter and warm clothing, 39—sufferings from cold, 39—want of fuel, 39—the losses of the French presenting the form and want of food, &c.—their means of land transport crippled, &c.—the food of the French army, 153—French derived from their strength, 154—difficulties obstructing fair comparison between the French and the English, 155—the French medical statistics, &c.—their defective state, 157—the information, however incomplete, which those statistics convey, &c.—maladie responding the hardness endured by the French soldiers, 160—frost-bite and scurvy, &c.—the sufferings of the French troops caused a great measure by administrative failure, 161—extent to which their sufferings and losses became masked from observers, 162—the transport of the French sick and wounded by sea, 163—good state, at first, of the French hospitals on the Bosphorus, &c.—the sufferings of the English army, 164—grievous excess of work that perforce was imposed upon the men, &c.—failure of the land-transport power, 165—its effect in adding to the labours of our men, &c.—effect of the hurricane upon the plan of having reserves of food in camp, 166—deficiencies in the issue of supplies, &c.—the sailors camped on the Chersonese, 168—defective cookery, and its effect on the health of the men, 169—impossibility of hauling up the timber for huts, &c.—the warm clothing, 170—careless of horses left above ground for want of heads to bury them, 172—the limit reached by Lord Raglan, in exacting what from his troops, &c.—and endured by our troops, 174—a view of our army, 176—another view of our army, 181—Lord Raglan at this period, 183—the complaints under which our army was suffering, 186—removal of the sick, &c.—their sufferings on board the sick transports, &c.—our hospitals in the Levant, 187—mortality in the hospitals on the Bosphorus, 189—the deaths that took place in our hospitals, &c.—comparison impracticable between the effect of the winter on the French and on the English army, &c.—recapitulation of the whole of the events which resulted in obliging the Allies to winter on the Chersonese Heights, 194—critical state of the Allied army, 195—the expedient to which it resorted, 196—Canrobert's means of showing a good countenance to the enemy, 197—Lord Raglan's, &c.—danger arising from publicity, 198—character of Lord Raglan's correspondence with the Home Government, 348—effect of the despatch upon the Duke of Newcastle, 349—meeting and adjournment of Parliament, 350—~~to be used~~—present at the public trials to ascertain by the gravity of testimony the action of the press upon the conduct of war, 348-354.

Motion in House of Commons for a Committee of Enquiry, 261—resignation of Lord Aberdeen's Government, 262—Formation of Lord Palmerston's Government, 263—the two displaced Ministers, 264—Sir George Grey, 265—Duke of Newcastle, 266—general import of the change of Ministry, 267

the war measures of the new Government, &c.—continued anger of our people, 286—fear that they might usurp a control over the military power, 46.—question how the new Government should satisfy the public anger, 46.—their determination, 46.—Lord Fannatt, 286—he is connected with the movement for a federal Union, 286—the business of the campaign, 290—his despatch of the 1st August, 290—warning us “to give words to Lord Bexley,” 290—on 1st

Section of the four 'Private' Ministers, 307—their successors, 308—end of the voyage, 309—vote of the Commons, 310—the appointment to the Committee, 311—the House unwilling to receive the vote, 310—the Committee appointed, 312—the import of this measure, 313—Government writers brought under censure, 313—the Senate not opposed by the reasonable of Parliament, 311—violence of the language used in the House of Commons, 313—Mr Reesbach, 313—other prominent members of the Committee, 314—suspension of the motion to make the Committee a 'secret' one, 317—the labours of the Committee, 316—its report, 320—reports concerning 'the health of the men and care of the sick and wounded, 321—papers of great value on the subjects presented to our War Department.

It was agreed that a 2000 per cent. increase in the ministers. 392 — their salaries were increased to a great degree.
The effects of the new law will

Enquiry demanded and granted, 394—constitution of the Court of Enquiry, 46.—its proceedings at Chelsea, 395—the report of the Board on the "animadversions," 396—and on the question of the road, 396—the now cleared and narrowed state of the enquiry, 397—on one of the "avertible" sufferings, 46.—the whole report of the Board, which is to be challenged, Mr Fisher, 398—the part of the Report in which the Board showed the case of the 'gentry-like' peerage. ¶

Acquiescence of the State in this decision. §31—what accumulation of authentic materials for forming a judgment as to the sense of the sentence, &c.

The Allied armies after mid-winter recovering health and strength, 305—the French losses much more than compensated by reinforcements, 44—the English, 339—the long-continued want of the hands required for making a road, 44.—road made to last by one man from Malaklava to Kadiuk, 49.—and by Desvres's troops to the Col, 49.—the railway, 49.—the land-transport train under McMurdo, 337—our army at last relieved by the French from some portion of the tell, 339—supplies of warm clothing, 340—The endeavour to place our army under huts, 341—that proved to be for the time a mistake—some of us were unoccupied, 342—symptoms of improvement discerned by Lord Raglan and others, 44.—the Crimea Army Fund set aside, 342—led by Sir George and Saerens, 44.—After the Russians, Germans, & Americans, 343—The march of our army, 344—restored health and strength of our army, 344.

use of the dispositions made by the French and English for the care of their sick and wounded, 280—the French hospitals, 16—allusion to the excess of maladministration in the English hospitals, 46—the nature of the time to be at the origin of a new power, 357—the aid provided by Women, and accepted by the State, 16—Miss Stanley, 36—the hospital at Kulliel, 362—the one at Smyrna, 364 it is to be observed, 364—the reinforcement of brain-power brought by Women, 16—her accession to the office of Queen of England, 366—the Lady-in-Chair, 16—the increase and growth of her power, 366—the aid given to General Gage by Macdonald and the 'Times' Fund, 378—the untiring zeal of our medical officers, 381—their power to heal and to cure greatly strengthened by the authority of the Lady-in-Chair, 16—the result of her sway, 384—indeed, without her we could not succeed between Man and Woman, 16—the mortality in our hospitals not yet, however, forced down, 390—the sanitary commissioners, 16—the change they wrought, 391—thoughts that every man is to bear his share of the burden raised by the memory of the winter campaign, 393.

Wolff, Lieutenant, v. 78.
 Wollaston, Lieutenant, iii. 90.
 Wolseley, Captain, now General Viscount, ix. 180, 181—*in the attack of 'the Quarries,' his ceaseless exertions (though wounded), first in Engineers' work, and then in combat, 125, 126—taking of the castle of Ischie, Colonel Commandant of Engineers, and his share of resistance which (aided by fortune) proved so successful, & he remained alive after the battle, 126.
Womsey—death of the Captain, vi. 11—afterwards, his impetuous charge, vi. 258, 259 note—the survivors of his charge, 250.
 Wombwell, Sir George, v. 270, 289 note, 292—the escape of, 290, 291.
 Wood, Colonel David, vi. 182 of sq.
 Wood, Mr., his account of the scene of the Bay of Balaklava, ii. 306 note.
 Woodford, General Sir Alexander, vii. 285, 472 note.
 Woodhouse, Captain, vi. 179 note.
 Woodhouse, a name of developed by Russians, viii. 19—by Allies, ii. 202.
 Wormsloe Gorge, ix. 180, 184.
 Wormsloe, i. 2, &c., the, vi. 204, 206, 208, 209, 215, 420, 424.
 Wormsloe, Prince, v. 4 note.
 Wormsloe's battery against Sevastopol siege-works on, viii. 31—Colonel Kelly's dispositions to meet attack, 32—charge by Captain Years, 34—defeat of the Russians, 34—fighting renewed, 37—Colonel Kelly takes his men over, 38—*is wounded and taken prisoner, 38—means of resistance collected, 39—fight at the Mortar Battery, 100—the enemy defeated, ii. 184, 185, 119 of sq., 114, 116, 118.
Wormsloe road, the, vi. 34, 357 of sq., v. 33, 35, 36 note, 36, 103 note, 626, 627, 324, 325; vi. 11, 79 vii. 8, 26, 34, 101, 104.
 Worthington, Captain, iii. 186.
 Worcester, Major-General, returns to neighbourhood of Liverpool under vii. 47—in his stead Krouskoff afterwards ordered to attack Eupatoria, 49—his command in the Kerchian Peninsula, 250, 251; ix. 41—his retreat, 48—his destruction of his coast batteries, 49—his destruction of food, 45, 46, 50.
 Wright, Archdeacon, chaplain of the forces at Lord Raglan's death, ii. 302.
 Wolfe, Rear-Admiral, ix. 46—he leaves some vessels of his squadron, 47—his return away in the Sea of Azov, ii. 44, 45.
 Wynne, vi. 187.
 Wynne, Captain, vi. 302.

Yates, Captain, v. 279 note.
 Yeo, Lucy, General, iii. 49—*his Pulkovo, 110 of sq.—the left column fights with his Pulkovo, i. 1, 2, 180, 181, 182, 183—his obstinate conduct, 200 of sq.—his trials as an officer, 202 of sq., 212 note, 214, 411 note, vi. 40 note, vii. 17., vi. 188, 189—strength of the column moving with him, ii. 1—*the fire received by this column, 187—his advance to the straits, 188—his retreat, 189—the loss of, 184—Lord Raglan's despatch on the loss of, ii.
 Yelverton, Captain, vi. 307.
 Yen Kai, ii. 45, 46, 48, 51 of sq.
 Yeton, ii. 312.
 Tonge, Duke D., iv. 302.
 York, Colonel, v. 248, 250, 253 note.
 Young, iii. 157.
 Young, Mr., vii. 487 note.
 Yussup, General, vi. 30 note.

Balaclava Battery, ix. 95, 96, 101, 102, 103.
 Balaclava Division, the, ix. 21 of sq.
 Balaichine, Hussars, in Krouskoff's night attack, vi. 46—French division in attack of, ii. 46 and note—final movement by, vi. Wormsloe Bridge, vi. 4 note of ii.
 Zaraysk, Captain, iv. 78.
 Zouaves represent, the character of, vi. 109—*at the Alma, 182, 183, 184—Prince Napoleon abandoned to the point of the battle by his, 183—*of Tigranian, brave troops from one of the charging and wounding English guns, vi. 17—*the impetuous, fierce, determined of one coming into the battle, 200—*the impetuous charge, 207 of sq.—*the way they charge, 201—*the captain who got the French infantry, ii. 10—*that both in Lord Raglan's, their feeling that as was the true men of men they would chance to lead them in battle, ii.********

Digitized by Google

Original from HARVARD UNIVERSITY

This book should be returned to the Library on or before the last date stamped below.

A fine of five cents a day is incurred by retaining it beyond the specified time.

Please return promptly.

~~DUE FEB 10 '49~~

~~APR 27 '56 H~~

~~APR 15 '59 H~~

Widener Library

3 2044 105 346 001